Mr. MCRAE. I yielded to the gentleman to make the request, but not to take me off the floor. I want to say what I have to say now. I agree to a great deal that has been said on the other side of this question, but I do not come to the same conclusion my friends do in regard to this creating a monopoly. I believe you can do nothing which will more effectually tend to establish a coal monopoly and raise the price of coal and private coal lands than the withdrawal of the public coal lands from the market by the United States. I think the best way to secure in the future an ample supply of coal at fair rates is to provide some simple, honest way of disposing of the public lands in small holdings to actual bona fide settlers of the country. They will protect it and preserve it better than the Government can.

But the moment you say you will not sell coal lands, just that moment the North Pacific Railroad and other companies, with their millions of acres of such coal lands, will at once raise the price of coal and coal lands. How can the people get the coal? If the syndicates own most of the private coal lands and the Government refuses to dispose of such public land we are in a bad fix.

You ought to say to the people of the country that they may go on prospecting for minerals of all kinds; go on making investigations, and secure what they want if they can find it at a fair price; we want the country developed. That is the best protection to the people against corporate monopoly. It is the only protection against the coal monopoly we hear so much of here this evening. It is the only protection to the people whose lands have been so recklessly disposed of.

What is to be done with the coal lands unless the Government proposes to go into the business of mining coal? No one dares propose such a scheme. If we have coal land the important question is how we are to get it in such shape as to enable the people to get the benefit of it. The Government will have to take it out or else provide some way to dispose of the land or coal itself. You can not get coal without money and labor. People will not dig coal for nothing. For the chances of a paying mine some will take big risks.

I am in favor of allowing the settlers who have the good fortune of finding coal upon the lands which they occupy as homesteads to have the advantage of whatever coal they may find in it. The coal is not lost to the country at all. If, on the contrary, you say you will not part with the title to coal lands no one who hears me will live to see the coal disposed of. The private coal lands now held by corporations will be increased in price and the price of coal itself likewise increased. These corporations will, I fear, be able to defeat any legislation in the future.

I am not in favor of aiding in any way the owners of private coal lands either now or in the future, and therefore I would give the benefit arising from such to the settlers. This system has made our country the greatest mineral producing country in the world. We lead them all in the output of coal even.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The railroads of this country control the existing coal mines of the United States. That is a proposition no one will dispute.

Mr. PAYSON. That is a proposition which is disputed everywhere.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If that be so, the Northern Pacific Railroad does not control the coal lands along the line of that road.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman is mistaken. Along the Northern Pacific Railroad there is not a pound of coal on the Pacific Railroad lands—not a pound, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Is it not true that coal companies are formed by men in connection with the railroad companies? I know that to be the case along the Central Pacific road.

Mr. MCRAE. Let me inquire whether the Northern Pacific did not get its land under a grant made by Congress and not through the operation of any general land law?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Of course that is a fact. I resume the floor. Of course this bill can not be given ex post facto effect upon lands to-day which have left the public domain and which are in the hands of private owners.

It does not apply, of course, to the coal lands belonging to the North Pacific or to the Central Pacific, or to other railroads where coal lands were embraced in the grant made to them by Congress. It is true, wherever lands are granted to individuals embracing coal lands, that in a short time these lands will be absorbed by railroad companies and be controlled by railroad monopolies. We know this from experience. It is done sometimes by those interested in railroad companies being the owners of the coal land or by the railroads mining the coal themselves. But my statement is true that the coal and coal lands of the United States are controlled pretty generally by the railroad companies. The anthracite-coal fields, covering 477 square miles, certainly are controlled by railroad corporations to-day, and the railroad companies control the price of coal lands, and they control pretty generally the selling price of coal itself.

So we stand in this position, and I ask gentlemen to look at it and see if there is not some remedy to be provided in behalf of the people. Coal lands exist along these great lines of road which have the capacity to supply coal which may be needed for many years.

Second, that in the nature of things the great carrying companies will control these existing coal lands which have been segregated from the public domain.

Then the third proposition is this: That being so, is it wise for the American Government to retain the title to these coal fields still remaining in the public domain? That is simply the pressing question before us now on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I advocate that heartily.

It does not follow that the Government must go into the coal business. It is no objection really to this general proposition that the Government would have to mine coal. Not a bit of it. This proposition looks ten or twenty years ahead. During those ten or twenty years there can be found wisdom and capacity enough in the American Congress to pass such legislation as may be necessary.

Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana does part with the title, and I think it is a doubtful remedy to seek to control the output after the title is parted with. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin is simply that we will retain the fee-simple. That is all.

It does not say that the Government will engage in coal-mining or charge a royalty. It says nothing of the kind. It simply provides—and that is the only thing about it—that we shall retain the title to the coal and iron lands. Now, why should we not retain it? What compulsion is there to give these coal-fields to the great corporations of the country? Was it the genius of the public-land law to provide for associations, for a few corporations controlling this article of absolute necessity; or was it the genius of that system to provide for the individual? Certainly the latter; and I can see no earthly reason why the United States Government shall not now retain control over that portion of the public domain which may contain mineral deposits.

Mr. HERMANN. Do you withdraw it from the people altogether?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No, that would not follow.

Mr. HERMANN. I understand it does.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. And so far as that is concerned, I would rather take the chances of injuring some individual than to give this entire business into the hands of the Northern Pacific, the Union Pacific, the Texas Pacific, or any other railroad or corporations to acquire the right to control the whole of the coal-fields for over 500 miles. That, I think, is the serious objection.

It seems to me that we are reaching a time now when there ought to be a little bit of prevision, a little forecasting as to the future and the condition of the future of this country ten or twenty years hence. In view of that I do not feel under the slightest compulsion to give to any association, and especially to any railroad company, the title to the coal lands of the United States.

Mr. HERMANN. But why not give it to the individuals?

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask unanimous consent that the debate upon this clause and amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. PAYSON. I would like to be heard for a short time on this question, and would suggest twelve minutes at least.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I want to be heard also.

Mr. WEAVER. I wish to be permitted to occupy the floor for a short time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent, then, to close the debate in fifteen minutes.

Mr. WHEELER. I can not give consent to that. I must object for the present at all events.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have asked that fifteen minutes be allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was one of the committee sent by this House to investigate the troubles in the mining regions of Pennsylvania during the last winter. I learned a great deal there about this coal question, and saw a great deal during that investigation which I hope has taught me some wisdom, and which I think it will be well for the House to know and well for the people of the United States to understand. I found there the anthracite region of the world in the hands of a very few people. I found great railroad corporations not only carrying coal, but mining coal. I found that gradually and through the course of years they had crowded out the private owners until one company has secured the control of and represents a principality in extent in which is found this great necessity of life.

Now, sir, we have a chance to do something for the people. We have an opportunity to do them a great deal of good, an opportunity to adopt a principle which in the future will give them cheap fuel, which will put within their reach this necessity of life. We have an opportunity to enact such legislation here as will prevent it from being controlled by a company or set of men seeking to use the necessities of the people for speculation on behalf of capitalists and others.

This amendment offered here proposes no system, so to speak. It simply says to this House, "Wait; do not dispose of this matter to-day; do not adopt the system now; do not embalm into law the present method of disposing of your coal lands, but hold them long enough so that you may think over it, so that you may give your wisdom to it, so that at some time, after consideration, after digesting the system properly, you may erect a system here which will be a blessing to the people for all time." It is not a matter that should be hastily considered, and hence I hail this proposition to consider it with pleasure. It is in that aspect that I welcome the matter. It is not because it decides a mere title, but it gives us an opportunity after adopting it to construct any defenses that may be necessary to protect the people and to protect the Government on this important matter.

For that reason I shall support the amendment and hope every Representative and friend of the people in this House will vote for it.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the District appropriation bill, and that the House accede to the request of the Senate for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. CLEMENTS, Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL, and Mr. MCCOMAS as managers on the part of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, non-concurred in by the House, to the bill (H. R. 8989) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, asked for a conference thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Senators PLUMB, DAWES, and COCKRELL.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2601) authorizing the construction of railroad bridges across the Snake River and across the Clearwater River by the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1851) providing for an international marine conference to secure greater safety for life and property at sea.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1365) for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Yorktown, Va., and making an appropriation therefor; and

A bill (S. 82) for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry S. French.

The message also announced that the Senate had non-concurred in the House amendments to the bill (S. 1669) authorizing the Mississippi and Louisiana Bridge and Railroad Company of Natchez, Miss., to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Natchez, asked for a conference thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Senators VEST, CAMERON, and DOLPH.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 478) to place the name of Rev. Stephen M. Collis on the muster-roll of the Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry as chaplain thereof.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 956) for the relief of the heirs of Christopher Cott.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, non-concurred in by the House, to the bill (H. R. 6833) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, asked for a conference thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Senators HALE, ALLISON, and BECK.

AMENDMENTS TO LAND LAWS.

Mr. WHEELER was recognized.

Mr. WHEELER. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. PAYSON. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are not looking at this proposed legislation from a proper standpoint. What the situation may be in Pennsylvania, where the anthracite coal-fields are located, which are rendered specially valuable because of their proximity to the great cities lying along the seaboard, it seems to me is not an element to be considered in connection with this proposition. A ton of coal lying in the bowels of the earth unmined is of no more value than a ton of granite unmined in the mountains of New Hampshire.

The only coal affected by the operation of this bill is the coal that lies in land the title to which now belongs to the General Government. Whether Congress has been sufficiently guarded; whether legislation with reference to the disposition of land to the Union Pacific and the Northern Pacific Railroads was proper or improper as to these coal fields within their limit, is a matter that is not material now. I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a pound of coal to be affected by the operation of this bill in which any of these railroads have either a direct or indirect interest; not a pound. And when gentlemen say that this amendment should be adopted because there is no necessity for its present passage, they speak without light.

In the great regions of the Northwest, Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, Utah, Washington Territory, and the State of Oregon, with the exception of a few coal mines that are operated on the line of the Central Pacific road and a few beds of lignite that are found in Western Dakota, and that is of no practical use as fuel unless mixed with the bituminous coals of the East, there is not a coal mine to-day that is being operated. I have seen, in the visits I have made in the Northwest, on the engines of the Northern Pacific Railroad coal that has been transported from Pennsylvania to the extreme regions of the West mixed with that light lignite for the purpose of fuel, or with coal that came in ballast from Australia and England to the Pacific coast. I have been told after making special inquiry among those who knew about it, as I have said before, that, with this exception, there is not a coal mine now being operated in that vast area of country. Recently south of the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad coal mines have been discovered in the Snow range of mountains and in other places in the Rocky Mountains.

If this amendment shall be adopted, where are those people to get their coal from? Of what earthly use is it? This amendment proposes that the Government shall retain the title; an absolute prohibition upon the disposition or mining of the coal.

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PAYSON. With pleasure.

Mr. WEAVER. The people out there will have no trouble in getting coal.

Mr. PAYSON. But the people out there are having trouble in getting coal. If it can not be mined, how are they to get it?

Mr. WEAVER. It can be mined.

Mr. PAYSON. How?

Mr. WEAVER. It is the duty of this Government to provide a method by which they can get the coal. That is what we are here for.

Mr. PAYSON. I am coming to that. I have asked the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] twice to indicate to this House what plan he would recommend for its adoption. Will the gentleman from Iowa say he favors the plan of leasing coal mines? That presupposes a bill will be introduced here organizing a system of governmental supervision for the operation of coal mines on government land wherever coal can be found, appointing employés, and all that sort of thing. Does the gentleman from Iowa, in the most hopeful view of the situation, expect that any scheme of that kind can run the gauntlet of Congress and become a law? I will be glad to yield now for the answer.

Mr. WEAVER. I will answer in my tin e.

Mr. PAYSON. And again, if there is any other plan except that of leasing I do not know what it is, except that the gentleman indicated that there would be a royalty upon the product to be paid to the Government. Then what? That presupposes that somebody is going to operate it, that somebody shall have the control. I know all our prairies in Central Illinois are underlain by coal. We get all the coal we want at a royalty of from 3 to 10 cents a ton. It amounts to nothing practically. But if a bill is introduced into this House proposing to establish an army of officers, like those of the internal revenue, what will they have to do? To collect a royalty from coal from the mines, which royalty will have to be paid by the consumer. Nothing of that kind could be done which would prevent combinations among those operating the mines with any more certainty of success than to prevent a combination if they were the owners.

So, Mr. Speaker, the question presents itself as a living question now. The Government having the coal lands and there being a necessity for their disposition, what is the best way to make it? The committee believed that the disposition of coal land in small areas to individuals and a prohibition upon combinations was the best way.

Mr. RANDALL. At an increased price.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, at an increased price above the ordinary price of land, not less than $10 an acre being charged for coal lands. If the Government reserves this coal land it might as well be out of existence; it is only valuable as it can be used, and when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] talks about the preservation of this coal for the wants of the distant future he knows, and everybody knows, that the coal will be used only as there is a necessity for its use. A million tons of coal lying at the different dumps in the State of Illinois is worth nothing unless a purchaser comes for it, and no purchaser does come for it unless there exists a necessity for its use.

Therefore, inasmuch as it is the business of Congress to legislate for the present wants of the people, and inasmuch as these lands are not to be held for the purpose of swelling the sum in the Federal Treasury hereafter, it seems to me that the provisions in this bill for the disposition of such coal lands to individuals in limited quantities is a wise one and ought to be adopted. If the decision which gentlemen who are favoring this amendment have come to is a correct one, why would it not be a good plan to revolutionize our system with reference to the deposits of the precious metals and increase the revenue of the Government in that way? But that has never been the idea of any American Congress.

Our policy has been to dispose of the public property for the benefit of all the people. There is a demand to-day for the opening up of the coal mines which have been discovered out in the extreme West. Not an acre of the land contemplated by this bill belongs to the railway companies, nor can it belong to them under the provisions of this bill; and the fact that out of the prodigal grants of public land which have been made heretofore to various railroad companies in the West these companies are now making a reservation as to minerals furnishes no argument at all why we should adopt the proposed policy with reference to the lands which we still retain.

There is no monopoly so far as I know in the bituminous coal regions of this country, and I live in the midst of one of them. It may be that in the bituminous region of Pennsylvania to which reference has been made such a difficulty has presented itself, but those fields are extremely limited in area, and their value is greatly increased by reason of their proximity to the cities of the East. But, on the contrary, wherever in the West coal is found it is found in great areas. Any man having a farm anywhere in my country may have his own coal mine by sinking a shaft 300 or 350 feet in depth.

There is not a particle of monopoly about it. There is no more monopoly of the bituminous coal in my district than there is a monopoly of air in this Chamber, and neither is there in the far West, as I have learned from inquiries which I have made during three several trips to the Pacific. I know that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] asserts vehemently from time to time that such monopolies do not exist, and I now ask him to name the locality where the railway companies own the coal fields, and if he should answer that some of the railroad companies in his own State control some of the coal fields there, I will say to him that not one of the coal fields that are affected by this bill could in any possible contingency become the property of a railroad company.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The coal fields in Colorado, and, I think, in Southern Kansas, and the coal mines along the Union Pacific Railroad are controlled by persons connected with that company.

Mr. PAYSON. I did not catch accurately what the gentleman said about the coal lands of Southern Colorado.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Those coal lands are in the hands of a company.

Mr. PAYSON. The railroad company?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No; but a company composed of parties inside of the railroad company.

Mr. PAYSON. Let me correct the gentleman. The gentleman, I suppose, has not made any personal investigation of the matter on the ground?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No.

Mr. PAYSON. The great coal fields in Colorado, and the only ones worked, are near Rattoon. I spent two or three days there on the last trip which I made to the Pacific, and obtained information which has since been confirmed, and that information was to the effect that there is not a man interested in the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company who has a dollar of interest in the coal mines. It is true the mines are controlled by a corporation, precisely as a coal mine in my own locality is controlled by a corporation, of which corporation I happen to be a member.

There is a little coal mine there which supplies coal to my little town. There is an agricultural country round about extending half way to the city in which lives my distinguished colleague [Mr. ROWELL]. That coal mine is owned by individuals; but there is no more monopoly in regard to it than in regard to the water in the stream which runs through my town or the water in the Illinois River. So in Colorado the case is precisely the same.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. It is a matter of common notoriety in my State that while the mines are not controlled by the company per se, they are de facto controlled by parties connected with the company. That is true of the mines in the southern part of Kansas.

Mr. PAYSON. How will this legislation affect the mines in your State?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I will answer the gentleman. Of course this legislation can not affect the mines of which I have been speaking, because the Government has parted with the title to them. But we ought to seek by this legislation to prevent a repetition in the future of that which has occurred in the past, so that royalties may not be so high as they are in Pennsylvania where the price in some instances is 53 cents a ton. That is the object to which we should look in this legislation. Unfortunately it can not affect that which has already occurred; but as a matter of ordinary good judgment we should seek to prevent its repetition.

Mr. PAYSON. In my own time, I would be glad to know from the gentleman how he would dispose of the coal lands which the Government now owns in the Territories.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I suppose if the Committee on Public Lands would sit down and wrestle with this question——

Mr. PAYSON. We have "wrestled" with it; and this bill is the product; we have done our best at "wrestling;" at least I have.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No, my friend has not grappled with this particular proposition of how the Government should control these mineral lands.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, I have.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If the Public Lands Committee would take up this matter, I have not the slightest doubt they could devise a feasible method of dealing with the question.

Mr. PAYSON. But, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Public Lands has grappled with this question, and this bill is the result. If there is anything better, let us have some practical suggestion as to what should be done, rather than carping criticism upon what the committee has done. This measure is what we recommend to the House; if any one has anything better to recommend, something which is not mere non-action, let it be suggested, and if it is better than our proposition nobody will go further or move more quickly than I will to adapt myself to it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Of course, this legislation would cover large quantities of land not now known to be coal lands, and the probability is that before those lands could be utilized as such there would be ample time to provide some method either of leasing the lands or of reserving a royalty, or, what is perhaps better, simply doing nothing, the Government holding the title so that nobody may step in, thus preventing monopolies.

Mr. PAYSON. Why, Mr. Speaker, in this very bill we have included provisions on that subject which we think ought to meet the approval of the gentleman from Kansas. We provide that wherever any land is susceptible of use as agricultural land it shall be given to the farmer, and if later on it should be discovered that this land is underlaid with a vein of coal a thousand feet in thickness we allow him to use it just as he chooses or to sell it to whomever he pleases. We provide for the very condition of things which the gentleman seems to assume has not been considered by the committee.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, this is the best method we can adopt, unless it should be the judgment of the House that, in addition to the performance of legislative duties, the Congress of the United States, for the purpose of flooding the Treasury now overflowing, should go into the business of coal mining; and if it goes into that business why not enter upon the mining of gold and silver, or any other business the basis of which is property which the Government owns? This is not, in my judgment, the business of Congress. I have said all I care to say on this question.

[Mr. WHEELER withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, was recognized, and yielded to Mr. COBB.

Mr. COBB. I desire simply to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that there are two amendments pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment I submitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "United States," in the fourth line, insert "except on the lands sold as coal or iron lands."

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I now renew the suggestion I made to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the chairman of the committee, that this section be passed over informally with a view to returning to it after awhile, so that it may be considered, and let us go on with the rest of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that may be done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that this paragraph be informally passed over with the privilege of recurring to it to perfect it after the rest of the bill is concluded.

Mr. WEAVER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I have no objection; but only desire to ask if there is any limitation upon the debate?

Mr. HOLMAN. Not yet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I would like to have it understood that I retain the floor when we recur to that section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be recognized when the House returns to that section of the bill.

The Clerk will report the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. Before section 3 shall be finally disposed of by the adoption of the amendment I suggest that there ought to be two or three verbal changes.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been passed over informally.

Mr. PAYSON. Passed over without prejudice?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; to be returned to after awhile.

Mr. PAYSON. I have no objection to that.

The Clerk read section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That all public lands chiefly valuable for timber of commercial value as sawed or hewed timber, and every contiguous 160 acres, or less quantity thereof, in legal subdivisions, the greater part of which is covered with timber of commercial value as sawed or hewed timber, and unfit for cultivation, shall be classified as timber lands. No such timber land shall be sold, but the timber thereon of commercial value, as sawed or hewed timber, in tracts not exceeding 40 acres in extent, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, shall from time to time, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, be sold to the highest bidder, on sealed proposals, after due appraisement as hereinafter provided, at not less than the appraised value thereof; but the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, reject any and all bids at any time.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. After conferring with the chairman of the committee and other gentlemen of the committee, I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to take the place of section 4, and will say that it merely changes the phraseology of the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that there are amendments pending to this section, and they will have to be acted upon first before a substitute can be voted on.

Mr. MCRAE. The amendment I proposed for the committee is embodied in that, and this being in the nature of a committee amendment, will it not be first in order? My amendment being embodied in this, it is not necessary to delay on that account.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But this is a different amendment. Other amendments are pending.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Are not amendments coming from the committee first in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules an amendment to the pending paragraph must be acted upon before a substitute for the paragraph is in order. That is, it can be pending if in order, but can not be voted upon as a substitute unless an opportunity has been given to perfect the text of the section.

The Clerk will report the first pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. PERKINS:

Add to section 4:

"Provided, That any one owning farming lands and engaged in agriculture may buy, as under existing law, 40 acres of land or less, classified herein as timber lands, and upon making full payment therefor shall receive a patent thereto from the Government of the United States in fee simple."

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would like to ask if that is not accepted.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have abandoned the idea of selling the lands.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment, by Mr. SMITH, of Arizona, was read, as follows:

At the end of section 4 add:

"Provided, however, That timber not of commercial value, as sawed or hewed timber growing on public lands wholly unfit for cultivation, shall be free to the domestic use of any bona fide resident of the Territory in which said timber on such land is found."

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I would like to say to the House, in explanation of the conditions existing in this country, that this amendment ought to be adopted for the following reasons: Under the provisions of this act we find it is absolutely impossible for these people, who are engaged in mining or in agriculture and the various pursuits incident to frontier life, in many cases to obtain common firewood for kitchen use and domestic purposes in that country.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, if my friend from Arizona will yield to me a moment I think I am authorized on behalf of the committee to say that this provision will be adopted, with the further amendment adding the words "under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe."

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Well, I accept even that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to the amendment of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "time," in line 16, page 3, add:

"But no timber under this section shall be sold to any one except citizens of the United States."

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. That is Mr. NUTTING'S amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the amendment pending. If that amendment should be adopted it seems to me there should be added to it the usual provision.

Mr. MCRAE. Let us vote it down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will please send up his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not submit it now. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HERMANN. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 16, section 4, add:

"Provided, however, That no title shall pass to any such timber where the land upon which it was grown is in whole or in part fit for cultivation."

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think that is a proper provision.

Mr. HERMANN. I wish to add to it, as follows:

And the patent from the United States shall in all cases specially reserve said class of timber.

Mr. MCRAE. It is not timber land if it is fit for cultivation.

Mr. HERMANN. Whatever the form of the conveyance may be, I desire that all titles from the United States, evidenced by patents, shall contain a special reservation as to the particular timber, and that it shall not include any timber on land fit for cultivation.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him? The text of the section itself provides that the land shall not come within the classification of timber land if it is fit for cultivation. It specially provides that it must be unfit for cultivation before it can be denominated as timber land.

Mr. HERMANN. I understand that; but the mining laws particularly prescribe that only mining lands shall be sold, not agricultural lands. Yet in all agricultural patents there is a reservation as to the mineral land. I desire these conveyances guarded in like manner as to timber taken from land which is not tillable and fit for cultivation.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. There is to be no patent issued for the timber.

Mr. HERMANN. That may be as to lands which are mineral; yet they are prohibited by the law from passing under that particular clause in the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. That provision may be a great embarrassment.

Mr. HERMANN. I only offer it as an additional guard.

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] for section 4, the section under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 4 and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"That every 160 acres or less quantity, in contiguous legal subdivisions of the public lands, the greater part of which is covered with timber of commercial value as sawed or hewed timber, and unfit for cultivation, and which is chiefly valuable for such timber, shall be classified as timber lands. No such timber land shall be sold, but the timber thereon of commercial value as sawed or hewed timber, in tracts not exceeding 40 acres in extent, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, shall from time to time, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, be sold to the highest bidder, on sealed proposals, after due appraisement as hereinafter provided, at not less than the appraised value thereof: Provided, That no present company or corporation shall purchase or hold in any State or Territory a greater quantity of such timber than the timber on four quarter-sections of land: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, reject any and all bids at any time: Provided further, That timber on no isolated or disconnected tract or parcel of timber land of less quantity than 160 acres shall be sold, but such tracts or parcels of such lands may be disposed of under section 11 of this act."

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. In explanation of this substitute I desire to say that it embodies substantially the provisions of section 4 as it stands in the bill, the difference being a mere transposition of language so as to avoid some confusion by reason of apparent tautology.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What is the provision in the substitute in regard to selling lands?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Just what it is in the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That after the timber is taken off then the lands may be sold?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. There is no new provision introduced into the substitute at all. There is one thing to which I wish to call the attention of my friend from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN]. The last clause of section 6 has been inserted as a proviso in this substitute, making it a part of section 4. It was thought that it more properly belonged to that section than to section 6. I call the attention of the gentleman from Oregon to this fact because he offered some amendments to that clause. This substitute is approved by the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri. The amendment will be found on page 4 of the printed amendments.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I agree to that amendment. It has been already adopted by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of section 4 add:

"Provided, however, That timber not of commercial value, as sawed or hewed timber growing on public lands wholly unfit for cultivation, shall be free to the domestic use of any bona fide resident of the Territory in which said timber on such land is found, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe."

Mr. CHIPMAN. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is a substitute pending, and an amendment to that. Is the gentleman's amendment an amendment to the substitute?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I understood that the amendment to the substitute had been accepted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that my amendment be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the substitute the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall designate and reserve from sale, so far as practicable, shade-trees on the lines of the legal subdivisions of the lands on which said timber is located."

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in regard to that amendment that I am not altogether pleased with the general policy of the wholesale denudation of our country of its trees. I live in a State which was formerly noted for its forests, but from which the forests have melted away almost like the snow.

In that State whole sections which used to be covered thickly with trees are now without enough for shade, and along the roadsides and on the lines of the divisions between the farms the people are setting out trees to replace those which they might have saved if such a policy had been adopted as that which I propose in this amendment. It is to save the trees, to save the shade, to prevent our country from becoming as it were bald headed [laughter], without verdure, without life—it is for that purpose that I offer this amendment; and it seems to me that it ought to commend itself to every gentleman in this House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. PAYSON. To that substitute I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "value" insert "not less than 10 inches in diameter at the butt;" so as to read, "that every 160 acres or less quantity in contiguous legal subdivisions of the public lands, the greater part of which is covered with timber of commercial value, not less than 10 inches in diameter at the butt," etc.

Mr. PAYSON. I have offered this amendment at the suggestion of gentlemen whom I met recently in the West, who are largely interested in timber matters in Michigan. It was suggested that, in order to avoid any possible ambiguity as to what should constitute timber of commercial value, there should be a minimum limit fixed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MACDONALD. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona, and which has been adopted, authorizes the cutting for domestic use of timber which is not of commercial value by any person wherever he may find it, without his paying anything for it or acquiring any right or title thereto. While I am in favor of some privilege of that kind, I think this provision is too broad.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see how we can very well avoid adopting such a provision, which will apply to scrub oak and other forms of timber of no commercial value.

Mr. McRAE. And on land unfit for cultivation.

Mr. MACDONALD. It would appear that any person desiring to cut timber for domestic use need only claim that the timber he wants to cut is not of commerical value.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see how we can make the provision more definite.

Mr. HERMANN. I move to amend the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] by striking out "four quarters" and inserting "one quarter," so as to limit the quantity of timber to one quarter of a section, rather than one section or one square mile.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, it has frequently been asserted during this debate that too much latitude has been given for the operations of corporations or syndicates to obtain control of the public domain in reference to mineral and agricultural lands as well as timber lands. It occurs to me the time has arrived when there should be fixed a limit as to the amount of timber which can be acquired in this way by any person, corporation, or association. In my judgment one square mile is entirely too much for any one person to acquire, especially in view of the fact that our timber resources are nearly exhausted in certain portions of the nation. To grant this privilege as to one quarter-section seems to me sufficient; and by this restriction we give increased facility for the great body of the American people to become at some time or other the owners of a portion of the timber domain of the country. In this spirit and with this view I have offered the amendment.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, if this amendment is to be adopted, this timber section appears to me to be entirely futile. Any man who knows anything about operating a saw-mill—at least in the southern country—must know that no man can afford to establish a saw-mill if he is limited to 160 acres of land. Such a restriction would simply invite evasion of the law. If you mean to sell the timber to the highest bidder, a small enough quantity to which to restrict the miller is 640 acres.

This timber must be cut within the time fixed in the act, five years—a reasonable time. There is no method by which any one can obtain a monopoly. Unless you mean to say that you will not give millers an opportunity to buy enough land to justify them in locating a mill, this amendment ought not to be adopted. If you do not want to sell the timber, but keep it—a policy of which I would be in favor—then let us strike out this whole provision. You must do one of two things: either you must sell the timber or keep it, to be depredated upon. If you sell it, you must sell it in some way which will enable the buyer to cut it to advantage and supply cheap lumber.

Mr. HERMANN. It does not necessarily follow that if we make the restriction proposed in my amendment we are not to sell the timber. By reason of this restriction we can sell the timber to a greater number of persons. Instead of selling it to corporations or syndicates we can sell it to men of small means. If the mills desire to purchase, let these men have an opportunity of selling it to the mills.

Mr. McRAE. You simply invite the small millers to go in and make combinations.

Mr. HERMANN. We allow a larger number of individuals to buy.

Mr. McRAE. But anybody can buy who wants to.

Mr. HERMANN. Under my amendment, men of small means who would not be able to purchase 640 acres can buy 160 acres.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not compromise this matter by making the restriction two quarters, half a section?

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, the committee went over this bill thoroughly; we voted down an amendment of this character; and I believe that at least the members of the committee ought to oppose such amendments. I care nothing about the matter personally; but it seems to me foolish for us to adopt a provision which assumes that millers can locate mills for the sake of the timber yielded by 160 acres of land. They can not do it in my part of the country, because the timber yielded by that quantity of land could be cut off by some large mills in a month.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. The provision under consideration contemplates a sale, not of the land, but of the timber upon it. If it is the purpose to put this timber upon the market, it certainly ought to be done in such a way as will produce the largest amount of revenue. The purchaser is limited to five years in which to remove the timber; and the land itself remains the property of the Government after the timber is gone.

Now, the bill provides that the timber lands shall be sold in 40-acre tracts. No quantity exceeding 40 acres can be bid in at one time. This limitation goes simply to the maximum amount which may be purchased. It provides that no person shall be permitted to buy or hold more than that amount of land. It provides they shall not purchase exceeding 640 acres. I say if we are pressing to sell timber lands we ought to sell them in a way which will bring the largest amount to the Government. Is it not true men may establish mills who would buy 640 acres, but would not hazard the investment necessary if they are to be limited to 160 acres? If that be true, to attempt to limit 160 acres as the maximum will reduce the price to be received by the Government.

Mr. STOCKDALE. So far as the timber lands in Arkansas and Mississippi are concerned, there are none of them which are not susceptible of cultivation. There is not a foot of them which may not be cultivated. If, therefore, this is limited to timber lands not fit for cultivation, it will not apply to timber lands in my district or my State.

Mr. MCRAE. If fit for cultivation, then they are not timber lands.

Mr. STOCKDALE. If the gentleman will closely observe the language used in the fourth section, he will see that these timber lands can only be lands unfit for cultivation. So far as the lands in my district and State are concerned, there is not a foot of timber lands which is not fit for cultivation. I consider therefore that those timber lands can not be sold under this restriction.

I made no objection, because I thought people living in the Northwest, where there are thickly-timbered lands, ought to understand their own business, and that the timber might be sold off the land. Those gentlemen agreed to it because it would sell the land and allow the lands to be denuded and put in condition for cultivation. But when this amendment was introduced providing that only timber lands should be sold not fit for cultivation, as there are in my State and district no timber lands unfit for cultivation, of course it would not apply to any lands in that State at all. The amount provided for here is too small upon which to establish a saw-mill. In my State saw-mills established for commercial purposes require 5,000 acres.

Mr. MCADOO. I do not believe the Government of the United States ought to become a landlord or trader. I believe the true policy for the present in regard to the public domain is that we shall pursue a conservative course, and when the public domain ceases to be settled in good faith by actual settlers we shall be careful to provide some proper and effective limitation.

Now, as to the timber. It is a singular proposition at this time, when the United States Government is placing a premium on the planting of trees and the preservation of the forests, that we shall give a stimulus towards cutting them down. One of the greatest demands of the country is that the forests shall be preserved, and one of the principal reasons why we are advocating free lumber on this side is to protect our forests, and not that we shall make the timber on our public lands, as proposed here, a commercial article for auction.

Mr. HOLMAN. What would be the difference between preserving the timber on the lands, or protecting the lands without the timber? At present we are losing both land and timber in vast quantities.

Mr. MCADOO. I believe it is best for the people to go slow in such a matter as this.

Mr. HOLMAN. But we are going fast all the time; land, timber, and all are going.

Mr. MCADOO. Then let us stop it.

Now, as to the argument of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], if you give a small portion of timber land to a man, that he can not afford to erect a saw-mill upon it. Now, in the Western country, as well as in the East, to a certain extent, men are putting up small grist-mills to grind for the people of the neighborhood, for the people who raise wheat. The same will be the result in cases where timber lands are sold in small lots. The enterprising man will go amongst the people; he will put up his saw-mill, and will cut and saw the timber for so much, of every man who brings it to him. It is better for the miller and better for the owner of the timber that the enterprises shall be separated, and that there shall be a separate interest in the ownership of the land and the mill. What we want is to divorce coal from the transportation companies, and lumber from the corporations and monopolists who are getting hold of such vast quantities of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will interrupt the gentleman from New Jersey to state that the hour of 5 o'clock having now arrived, the House, under its previous order, takes a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 25, 1888.

SIR: Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN is hereby designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

AMENDMENT OF LAND LAWS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN] to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HERMANN. My amendment confines the entry of timber lands to 160 acres. At the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands I would be willing to modify that amendment to the extent of confining the maximum to 320 acres.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I stated before the recess that I was opposed to all this timber legislation. I have not opposed it here because I was voted down in committee, but will stand by it here. This bill comes before the House rather as a compromise measure, and was discussed in the committee as thoroughly as a measure of this kind could be discussed. I was opposed to the timber section altogether, and hoped that as I had conceded that such a section might be incorporated into the bill that no member of the committee would seek to amend any part of it that received the consideration this did, and which was adopted as a sort of compromise.

I want to repeat what I said before the recess, that this section amounts to nothing, or to but little if applied to my country, or to that section of the country from which I come, if you restrict it to 160 acres. I would be willing to wipe the whole thing out, but do not want a foolish statute enacted. I want to see the timber preserved as far as possible, both the timber lands and the agricultural lands, for actual settlers. It is supposed that the timber on no lands will be sold that are fit for cultivation. I am opposed to the changes that have been suggested here, and particularly in this section, although I am perfectly willing to adopt the bill as a whole as a sort of preliminary measure to be amended hereafter by such modifications or changes as may be found necessary. But if every section is to be cut up in this manner, and every member to have his own way, instead of taking the bill framed as it was in the committee as a whole, then I, with the two or three other members of the committee who opposed certain provisions of the bill, feel justified in presenting the various amendments to sections which were voted down in committee.

Mr. HERMANN. The gentleman forgets that I have agreed to modify my amendment to make it 320 acres.

Mr. MCRAE. Still that is not the bill that the committee adopted. It reported a bill fixing 640 acres, and even that against the protest of myself and others, three members, as I remember, who were distinctly opposed to the whole thing. Now, if this section is to be ridden down, then I say that the sections which were voted out before the committee we feel justified in bringing before this House for action. But we ought to agree to take this bill as a compromise measure, adopt it as it passed the committee, and trust to future legislation to correct and advance in the direction of such appropriate legislation as may be required, and thus step by step we may be able to accomplish what we desire.

I can not say what effect the legislation passed here will have upon the Northwest, where there is abundant and valuable timber land, covered, as I am informed, with the best kind of timber; but in my country, where the pines are not large, where the timber is scant, a large mill, working fifty or sixty hands, will cut the timber off of over 5 or 10 acres a day, especially when you have some subdivisions where there are not more than twenty or thirty trees to the acre. So, if you expect to sell timber lands, you must make it an inducement for the establishment of saw-mills and lumber manufacturers.

My friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], whom I do not see in his seat, undertook to tell us something about running a saw-mill and a grist-mill together. That is a thing of the past in this country. He certainly knows but little about the manufacture of lumber in the South and West. I do not suppose he ever saw much of the country west of the Mississippi River if he expects these little mills that we had twenty-five years ago to cut the timber of our country. It is absurd. We have no such saw-mills now. The mills run night and day and employ from twenty-five to one hundred hands, and ship millions of feet of lumber a week. We can not expect such machinery as that to stop to grind for the neighborhood on Saturday. These are not the kind of mills we are to have in the future.

So I repeat that if we are to engage in the lumber business, if we are to establish a lumber-yard, let us make it one that will pay; make it one that will do something. I do not mean by that to say that you should sell all the timber. Let it be restricted to 640 acres. That is about as little as any mill can afford to locate for, large or small, in my country.

Mr. HERMANN. I think the gentleman from Arkansas upon mature reflection will discover there is more wisdom in the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] than he gives him credit for. It might probably with equal grace be said of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] that he has not traveled a great deal in the milling country, if we are to infer the extent of his travels from the remarks which he has just uttered. It has been my experience among mills, in logging camps, etc., that the largest mills of the country are usually near water courses, usually connected with some shipping point. They are usually near some stream which enters into the forest, or runs in the direction of the forest; and from a particular stream the forests are connected by railroads, by logging-roads, etc. I will say this: that there is to-day among the small manufacturers situated in the forests of the West no greater inducement for their settlement than the proximity to mills; that the greater portion of the lumber manufactured in the West is to-day purchased from the small land-owners of the country.

It was said during the discussion of the tariff bill that these large mill-owners are becoming the millionaires of the country. If there is any truth in that at all, it is to be attributed to men who are the owners of timber lands, and especially those who have in connection with them shipping interests. But it is not those who have mills alone and who are compelled to purchase their timber from others. The settler comes over here and settles among the timber upon 160 acres of land, if you please, or, as I have known them to do, upon 40 acres. He then culls out the particular trees fit for commercial purposes, cuts them down, logs them, etc., places them upon his logging-team, takes them to the short railway or to the stream if it be convenient, and then, in the shape of a raft, the timber goes to the mill, and he receives his pay. In that way he is not only taking the timber to the market, but he is clearing up the land. He is utilizing that resource there which otherwise he would be compelled to dispose of by selling, burning and reducing to ashes, and which therefore would be a benefit neither to the Government nor to himself.

So I say, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO] was correct in saying these mills were a great benefit to the small land owners of the country. In the West, especially on the Pacific coast, of which I am now directly speaking, nearly all the large mill owners own some of the finest timber tracts in that country, some of them in quantity largely exceeding 100,000 acres of land. Yet but very few of them have recourse to their own land. They buy all they can from the small land owners around them, and when their lands are exhausted of timber they have left this great legacy to fall back upon. So that now it seems to me we should restrict these timber land purchases to the maximum of 160 acres.

Mr. McRAE. Why not strike it all out if your point is worth anything?

Mr. HERMANN. So that the poor man can come in as well as the rich. The gentleman asked, why can not the poor man have the same chance as the rich man? He is entitled to purchase the 160 or 640 acres. But who was first in the race, the rich man or the poor man? The poor have lead on their feet. The rich have wings. It is the rich who will reach the local land office first, and when he gets there he is entitled to 640 acres of land and will get it.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman knows very little about this bill which he has helped to frame if he does not understand that these lands are to be sold in 40-acre tracts to the highest bidder; so that there is no "getting there first" about it. I trust he will deal fairly with this matter. The land is to be put up and sold publicly. If it is proposed to sell the timber at all, why not give the rich man and the poor man an equal chance?

Mr. HERMANN. I ask the gentleman in all candor to answer whether at a sale at which there are competitive offers the poor man has the same opportunity with the rich man? Is it not the longest purse that generally gets the largest amount, even if more has to be paid for it? Is not that the fact?

Mr. McRAE. But the land is to be sold in 40-acre tracts. The man who buys 640 acres must buy in 40-acre tracts.

Mr. HERMANN. But he pays a larger amount.

Mr. McRAE. We can not help that. According to your proposition we should not allow the land to be sold at all. You should save it for the poor man.

Mr. HERMANN. I propose to save it for him by providing that only 160 acres, and no more, shall be purchased by any one person, corporation, or association. Under this plan it seems to me this great timber fund, this great lumber interest of the future, will probably last long enough to extend among a greater number of people than under the present provisions of this bill. My proposition is in the interest of the poor man, in the interest of the settler.

Let me say to the gentleman that timber is not found as it was a quarter of a century ago in great forests extending over an area of 50 or 100 miles. You may find 160 acres at one place; 2 or 3 miles further you may find 320 acres; 4 or 5 miles further you may find 40 acres. I venture to make the assertion that nearly all the great timber forests of the country have already been disposed of to corporations, associations, or syndicates, so that there is little left for the poor man.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on these various propositions proceed under the five-minute rule. I think we shall make better progress in that way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that further debate on the amendments to the pending bill be conducted under the five-minute rule. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad indeed if the members of the committee could unanimously agree to this proposed amendment. I abhor monopoly in any form in which it may present itself. In any proposition of this kind I favor the smaller number of acres rather than the larger number. There is, however, a great deal of force in the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] that the committee which prepared this bill ought, as far as consistent with the views which may be developed in the course of its consideration, to stand by the measure. I shall feel bound, therefore, to oppose this amendment under all the circumstances. Yet, taking the whole country throughout, I think it would be far better and juster that no one person should be permitted to purchase more than half a section of the timber on these public lands.

I live in a timber country where there are saw-mills everywhere; and looking at the subject from my standpoint I certainly do not desire to see any great establishments of this kind. I think a community is far better off with a dozen saw-mills of moderate size than with the same amount of business concentrated under the control of a solitary firm. The timber interest in my country is important, as it is in various portions of Indiana, and there is no concentration there of large tracts in a few hands. Generally one establishment controls about a quarter-section of land, more frequently 80 acres. Mills are found in all directions, small establishments employing five, six, or seven men. This diffusion of industries I regard as beneficial to the community. Still I believe I shall stand by the provisions of the bill as reported.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to speak in criticism of this committee, for I have the highest respect for it and its labors. I know how difficult it is to prepare, on so great a question as this, a bill which will meet satisfactorily the various ideas entertained by different gentlemen.

But I do not think it beneficial to the country or wise to separate this timber from the fee in the land. I believe that there ought not to be an acre of timber sold in this way. Gentlemen say that some of the land is not fit for agriculture. Very well; it is fit for timber. Where a tree grows something will grow. Let a man take his 160 acres for the sake of the timber, and let him make his money out of it in that way instead of raising cereals or other agricultural products. As was wisely said by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO], let the mill be owned by the small land-owner, and let the logs go to the mill as grist goes to a mill. This plan is best for the people.

I can not conceive any reason why the Government of the United States should sell its timber. We do not need the revenue. That is certain. Why part with the timber? It belongs to the people now; we do not need the revenue; why part with the timber?

Mr. HOLMAN. What do you propose to do with the timber?

Mr. WEAVER. If this provision be stricken out, let all this land be entered under the homestead law in quantities not greater than 160 acres.

Mr. PAYSON. The bill now makes that provision in express terms in regard to agricultural lands.

Mr. WEAVER. But, as the gentleman will see, I want that provision to apply to the whole of the lands, whether agricultural or not. If the land is not agricultural land, but forest land having timber on it, let it go exactly as agricultural land would go.

Mr. PAYSON. But I would like the gentleman to explain himself so that we may get his idea. All land which is agricultural land now goes free of cost under the provisions of this bill to the man who will take it. Does the gentleman from Iowa think for a moment that where a farmer can get agricultural land for the taking he will take land which is not agricultural land, simply because it is classed as timber land?

Mr. WEAVER. I do not; but I realize that this generation is not the only generation that is going to live on this earth; and that the 60,000,000 people who now inhabit this country are not all who are going to live here. The time will come when a man will be glad to own 160 acres of timber land, although not classified as agricultural land.

Mr. PAYSON. In the mean time what is to become of the timber as it matures? It is only valuable so far as it is utilized. Decay must have its effects; and if nobody can acquire it as timber land, and nobody will take it as agricultural land to live upon, how is it to be disposed of?

Mr. WEAVER. There is no danger of the timber decaying. Reproduction goes on as fast as decay; otherwise there would be no forests at all. I do not think it necessary to sell this timber for fear it is going to spoil on our hands. It has never spoiled in ages past.

Mr. HOLMAN. The present law authorizes the entry of these lands at $2.50 an acre——

A MEMBER. In some of the Territories.

Mr. HOLMAN. And on the Pacific coast, where the better class of timber lands are found. Some of those lands, as has been abundantly shown by evidence before the Land Department, are worth $200 an acre. Now what does the gentleman propose in regard to such lands? Would he have them sold at $2.50 an acre, or would he withdraw the land entirely from sale?

Mr. WEAVER. I would simply put that timber land on sale precisely as the agricultural land is put on sale, and for the same price.

Mr. HOLMAN. But we do not want to sell the land.

Mr. WEAVER. Let the lands be taken as homesteads.

Mr. HOLMAN. How can they be, when they are not adapted to agriculture?

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman is willing to sell land at $2.50 an acre and let the owner of the soil have the benefit of a vein of coal 40 feet thick which may be underneath the surface.

Mr. HOLMAN. We can not anticipate such a thing as that.

Mr. WEAVER. We know the fact exists in many places that there are veins of coal 40 feet thick on Government land. And we know also that on some of this Government land there is very valuable timber. Take the redwood tract, for instance, in California. Some of that land is now subject to entry, having been forfeited by the action of Congress. Other valuable timber land has been declared forfeited by departmental construction. In the case of some of this valuable timber land it may be well worth a man's while to go and live upon it, and make his home there.

I do not think the Government ought to speculate in that timber land. We do not need it; and the people need homes.

Mr. HOLMAN. You speak for the present; that is, we do not need it now.

Mr. WEAVER. No, we do not need it now. If we could get it in the Treasury, it would only tempt Congress.

Mr. HERMANN. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. To strike out "four quarter-sections" and insert "a quarter-section."

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Is that all there is of it?

Mr. HERMANN. That is all.

The question recurred on Mr. HERMANN'S amendment.

Mr. McSHANE. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Iowa it should not be the policy of the Government to speculate in timber on this land. This section provides all lands not adapted to agriculture shall be classified as timber land, if a portion of this land is covered with timber. How are we to judge whether this land is adapted to agriculture until all the timber has been removed from it? I hope this provision will be stricken out of the bill, and a provision will be inserted providing for taking this land under the homestead law, and if necessary reduce the number of acres. If the timber is of more value than it would be if on prairie land, let the value of the timber be considered in the number of acres allowed for a homesteader.

Mr. HERMANN. How would it be for a homesteader to make proof if the land is unfit for cultivation?

Mr. McSHANE. Very easily. I hold there are few sections of land in the country upon which a full compliance with the homestead act can not be had. On the side of a mountain the homestead law can be complied with.

Mr. WHEELER. Should not a man be allowed to make his home there if he so desires it?

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill allows that.

Mr. McSHANE. If lands can be entered, homes can be established on land although it may be on the side of a mountain. They can be used for agricultural or other purposes. It is not necessary the homesteader should raise corn on a homestead in order to comply with the homestead law. There are many things which can be done on a homestead which will comply with the law and make a home for the settler.

People talk about arid lands in the mountains. There are no more arid lands in the mountains. I have watched those mountains for years, and I say from change of climate homes can be established on those mountain tops and in cañons where the timber is removed so the land can be cultivated. I say that every year the rainfall is increasing, and although it may be difficult at the present time, I say that when the time does come that it is necessary to occupy those lands for homestead settlement they will be of such a character as will be susceptible of cultivation, and can be taken up under the homestead law or under this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that further debate, by unanimous consent, be closed on this amendment.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The question recurred on Mr. HERMANN'S amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question next recurs on Mr. McSHANE'S motion to strike out section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That all public lands chiefly valuable for timber of commercial value as sawed or hewed timber, and every contiguous 160 acres or less quantity thereof, in legal subdivisions, the greater part of which is covered with timber of commercial value as sawed or hewed timber, and unfit for cultivation, shall be classified as timber lands. No such timber land shall be sold, but the timber thereon of commercial value as sawed or hewed timber, in tracts not exceeding 40 acres in extent, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, shall from time to time, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, be sold to the highest bidder, on sealed proposals, after due appraisement as hereinafter provided, at not less than the appraised value thereof; but the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, reject any and all bids at any time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to insert——

Mr. McSHANE. I wish to strike out the section, and I believe that has precedence. My motion is to strike out section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. That takes precedence of the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. HOLMAN. But a word. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the main feature of the bill is to secure the lands adapted to agriculture for purposes of homestead settlement. That is the fundamental idea of the bill. The main object we have in view is to benefit actual settlers. Wherever the lands can be settled it is provided they can be entered under the homestead law. There is no single provision that does not look to that object. At the same time lands not valuable, not fit for agricultural purposes or for the establishment of homes, ought to go to the benefit of the whole people rather than to any favored classes. Such are lands covered with timber and not adapted to agriculture, and valuable only for the timber that is upon them.

And a case has recently occurred in the county of Humboldt, California, where a contest has arisen before the Commissioner of the Land Office, where lands have been bought up by a syndicate to the extent of some fifty or sixty thousand acres, valued at $150 to $200 an acre, which are being sold under the present law at $2.50 an acre.

The two objects of this bill are to accomplish, first, in the sale of the timber which can be made valuable, by a systematic course of procedure in regard to that character of land by which the whole people will get the benefit of it, and second, by reserving the lands themselves which are not adapted to agriculture, but test their recuperative capacity to produce new forests, the lands being always held by the Government.

I admit that there is another feature here in the bill which tends to the same object, and that is that the President of the United States may set apart any timber lands he may think proper as forest reservations.

That has a double object in view, first, to preserve the forest for public purposes; and, secondly, it prevents the possibility of monopoly of the lands, so that all of these important interests shall not be exhausted at once, but may project themselves into the future for the benefit of posterity.

Mr. McRAE. Right there I want to suggest to the gentleman that while I was not in favor of this provision, timber lands can not be sold now without the approval of the President.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, that is true.

Now, in conclusion, the whole country is aroused to the importance of selling timber and preserving the lands not adapted to agriculture. We have from every State of the Union, from Pennsylvania to Oregon, institutions organized as forestry societies, and we have at the Agricultural Department, paid by the Government at an annual appropriation amounting to $10,000, a Bureau of Forestry, created for the same purpose, to try to secure such regulations and forest laws as are wise to prevent waste and destruction.

This feature is especially pursued by these organizations. But they want us to go beyond all reasonable appropriations and allow a half million dollars annually to protect our forests. We do not deem that necessary. They want us to parcel out the lands, to distribute them in the manner they suggest; but we think the plan of the committee is much more effectual.

I trust, therefore, the House will not strike out the feature, but upon a more careful examination into all its details I think it will be admitted that it is one of the wisest measures ever enacted by Congress for the prevention of monopoly and at the same time the protection of the timber lands of the country, and especially in regard to the larger tracts of timber lands not adapted to agriculture.

Mr. McSHANE. The chairman of the committee states the object of this bill is to prevent the monopoly of the timber lands of the country.

Mr. HOLMAN. I say that that is one of the main objects.

Mr. McSHANE. A few years ago the Congress passed a law known as the "desert-land act." That has been in operation but a few years, where one citizen is entitled to a section of land. We find here in the Department of the Interior to-day 450,000 acres of land held by single syndicates under the desert-land act.

Mr. PAYSON. I hope the gentleman will be a little specific as to that. You do not understand exactly how it has occurred.

Mr. McSHANE. I am going to state just how it occurred. I find syndicates who procure men who make their declarations and take up the lands under the desert-land act, and after they have paid the amount necessary to procure the possession of the lands these syndicates perform the necessary work required under the law to make the final proof. That I will say, the first declaration of the first settler, and, by the way, he is not required to live on the land, but to make certain improvements; he is not even required to go to the land district to make his filing under the law, but his filing is placed upon record, and the syndicates perform the necessary requirements from that time on during the period of three years to effect and complete the improvements and secure the title. They have an assignment of the claims from the original party, and when the proofs are completed we find the claims being transferred and the patents issued to the syndicate performing the improvements of the land.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman is talking of existing law, not the provisions of the pending bill.

Mr. McSHANE. I am saying that this bill has similar provisions and will result in the same procedure.

Mr. McRAE. Certainly the gentleman has not read the fourteenth section of the bill or he would not make that statement.

Mr. McSHANE. Congress can pass no law to prevent a purchaser of timber, who purchased the timber and paid the Government, from transferring that timber to whomsoever he pleases.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that is true, would it not apply to the lands as well as to the timber?

Mr. McSHANE. Not to the homestead lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not to the homestead lands as well as to any other lands?

Mr. McSHANE. I claim that there is no land that a man can not take possession of by cultivation under the homestead act in the future.

Mr. McRAE. Then there would not be any lands covered by the timber-culture act.

Mr. McSHANE. No.

Mr. WEAVER. But somebody of course has got to determine what are agricultural lands.

Mr. McSHANE. Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, that the experience of the desert-land act is a sufficient reason and a sufficient experience for this House not to take a similar step in relation to the timber land of the country.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the remedy of my friend in that large class of cases where the lands can not be settled under the homestead law?

Mr. McSHANE. Where are those cases?

Mr. HOLMAN. You will find them all over Washington Territory. You will find them in Arizona and Montana. I have traveled extensively across millions and millions of acres that can not by human possibility be cultivated and that are covered with magnificent forests; all over the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevadas.

Mr. McSHANE. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt but what I can produce the testimony necessary to show that there are arid lands in Central Nebraska in a vicinity where we raise 60 bushels of corn to the acre. I can bring this House all the testimony it needs to show that that land is arid. The same thing can be said in Wyoming, in Montana, in Washington Territory, and all of the mountainous region. I say for seventeen years I have had a personal experience in the Rocky Mountains, and even on the mountain side the homestead law can be literally complied with.

Mr. HOLMAN. Take the east fork of the Yellowstone. Would you cultivate those slopes?

Mr. McSHANE. Yes; you can cultivate the east fork of the Yellowstone. You can not raise corn.

Mr. HOLMAN. What can you raise?

Mr. McSHANE. You can raise many things.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nothing.

Mr. McSHANE. It is not to-day fit for cultivation; but let it be held for a few years.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is just what this bill proposes to do.

Mr. McSHANE. No, sir.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I asked unanimous consent that debate be closed on this paragraph and this amendment. I think the question was not submitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TOOLE. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask that it be closed after five minutes.

Mr. HERMANN. I have an amendment which contemplates perfecting——

Mr. HOLMAN. That will not be cut out.

Mr. WHEELER. I must have a few minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will make it ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will extend the period and make it fifteen minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. TOOLE. It is evident there are some members here who are not conversant with the whole of the country which is covered or sought to be covered by this provision concerning the timber.

With due deference to my friend from Nebraska [Mr. McSHANE] I want to say that there probably can not be found 160 acres of land in the Territory of Montana, a section of country which embraces 140,000 square miles, upon which timber grows, that could be adapted to agriculture. The truth is, and I have lived in that country for seventeen years, that substantially all the timber grows on the mountain side, and the most precipitous mountains that are to be found in that country, utterly inaccessible.

The whole country is a country that has to be irrigated in order to produce crops, even in the valleys. It is utterly amazing and astounding to an individual who knows anything about it to hear statements made upon this floor that the lands that are covered by timber could be adapted to homestead and subject to agriculture. The valleys themselves that produce prolific crops are irrigated by artificial means in order to produce these crops. The mountains on which the timber grows could never be made to yield anything.

Now, suppose this provision is stricken out. The result will be that in Montana, Idaho, and Arizona, where we have undeveloped coal mines, and no fuel supply, no lumber supply, except such as we get in the Territories, there will be no way by which we can buy a foot of lumber and by which we can buy a dollar's worth of cord wood or anything of that kind, and we will be subject to extortionate charges in shipping them from the East or from the extreme West, where, according to the rates of transportation now, coal costs us $21 and $22 a ton.

If we are remitted to that process by which all of the lumber that goes into our buildings and all of the timber that goes into our mines will have to be purchased in that way, it will simply amount to striking down the mining and commercial enterprises which exist in those Territories. I trust that if any change is to be made these timber lands will not be held out entirely for homesteads. No individual could go and live for five years under the laws of the United States upon one of these precipitous mountain sides in order to acquire a title; no individual could live long enough to see his title perfected.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The debate this evening has been very profitable. I think we have learned a good deal about the true condition of affairs in the country which has been under discussion. Yet I was very much struck by the remarks made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McSHANE] and by the plan he proposed during the course of those remarks. I, for one, believe that this Government, situated as it is to-day, with an overflowing Treasury, ought not to try to make any money out of the public lands. I do not regard lands which may be a home for the people as a proper source for revenue. I believe in opening them freely to the people that they may be covered with happy homes, that we may allow the millions to go there whom they are now inviting; and then we will have no trouble about the revenue. The revenue will flow in from the industry which will grow up there and which will be gigantic compared with anything we will derive from the operation of this bill.

One word more. I regard this bill as putting a premium, so to speak, upon the destruction of our forests. It invites speculation; it invites combinations——

Mr. HOLMAN. Can you not now buy any of those lands you think proper in unlimited quantities at $2.50 an acre?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not this bill expressly provide that no more lands shall be sold than those of which the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Interior may approve the sale?

Mr. CHIPMAN. So far as concerns leaving the rights and liberties of our people with regard to the soil of this country in the hands of any President or other public officer, I would about as willingly turn them over to a combination or a syndicate or a "combine" of any kind.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has not the executive department throughout all our history controlled the sale of the public lands?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana whether the people of the country are now satisfied with the condition of affairs with regard to our public lands?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; and that is the reason we are now trying to legislate on this subject.

Mr. CHIPMAN. And you propose among other provisions of your legislation to cling to one of the objectionable features of the past.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is that?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Leaving it to the discretion of the President or any other officer——

Mr. HOLMAN. Somebody must administer your laws.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Somebody must administer the laws; but I propose to make the law so that he who runs may read, and so that there shall be no discretion in regard to this matter; that as to every foot of land on which an American citizen may build his home he may sit beneath his own vine and fig tree, President or no President, discretion or no discretion.

Mr. HOLMAN. What do you propose to do with those forests where the land can not be cultivated, but where, on account of the forests, the land is worth two or three hundred dollars an acre?

Mr. CHIPMAN. In the Lake Superior country—that great mining and lumber country—it was believed for years that the land could not be cultivated. But what do we see there to-day? Why, sir, that is a part of the great wheat belt of America. There was a time when a man who would talk of buying a farm and settling in the pine lands of the lower peninsula of Michigan would have been considered almost crazy; yet to-day hundreds of thousands of people are living there and carrying on farming operations extensively. I have been through the Northwest; I grew up with it, and I have seen the whole process. I say that under a provision of this kind in this bill there is chance for combination, there is chance for subtlety. In matters of this kind I would leave nothing to the discretion of any man; and I think the proposition of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McSHANE] would render these improper combinations an utter impossibility.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will take occasion to propose such amendments to the bill as will prevent the results he deprecates.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I will try to do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope you will.

Mr. WHEELER. Under ordinary circumstances, and if the question were presented to us for the first time, I should be very much in sympathy with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCSHANE] and the line of argument by which he has supported it. But after the committee has carefully considered this question, modifying proposition after proposition, and after we have finally arrived at the provisions of the fourth section, which, as every one must see, is a compromise, aiming as near as possible to suit the wishes and interests of the various Representatives from different parts of the country, the committee can not be expected to assent to any amendment which has not been thoroughly considered and which does not present the strongest claims for adoption.

I have an amendment which I can state the committee has agreed not to oppose, and which I now send up to the desk to be published in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment will be published in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The amendment is as follows:

After line 28, section 29, add:

"Provided, That after the 1st day of January, 1890, all the public lands in the State of Alabama shall be open to entry and settlement under the homestead laws."

Mr. WHEELER. The idea of this amendment, as of others which have been proposed, is that after the Government has offered the lands under the other provisions of this bill, if they still remain in the hands of the Government they may be allowed to be entered as homesteads, no matter whether they be mineral or timber lands, or whatever other conditions may exist.

I believe it consistent with the duty of the Government to get these lands in the hands of the people, and after a certain period has elapsed without the land being taken to allow any man to locate upon them, make his home there, and acquire title under the homestead law. I hope an amendment will be offered and adopted placing beyond question the power of the citizen to acquire lands in this way, no matter what they may contain, after they have remained a certain period in the hands of the Government without being taken up under any other provisions of the law.

A MEMBER. How long a period does the gentleman propose?

Mr. WHEELER. I would say two or three years as the extreme limit; and if after that period, though they may be coal lands, if they have not been entered under the law authorizing the entry of coal lands, then let any man go and take them who will comply with the provisions of the homestead law.

Mr. MCSHANE. If that principle would be good after a period of three years, why is it not good now?

Mr. WHEELER. It would be good now; but it is the opinion of many gentlemen that some lands may be so valuable that the Government ought to sell them for their full value. I say let the Government have full chance to do so; but if after a period of two or three years the lands have not been taken up under the coal-land laws or the iron-land laws, then let them be taken by any man who will comply with the homestead law and in that way acquire an indefeasible title. This principle, I think, will meet the views of many members of this House who object to the various provisions of the bill. Let the land be subject to the provisions of the law for a certain period, and then let every acre of land in the whole country be thrown open and entered under the homestead law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCSHANE] to strike out the fourth section.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Has the time for debate expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two minutes yet remain.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say, especially to my friends immediately around me, that this bill has been prepared with a great deal of care and labor by the Committee on Public Lands. It received first the careful attention of a subcommittee, which spent many months in its preparation, and afterward it was thoroughly discussed and amended in the full committee. I hope, therefore, that amendments will not be offered, unless they are considered vital, and that none will be submitted which are likely to embarrass the passage of the bill and counteract the good effects which the measure seeks. This is a good measure, as we believe, and I appeal to gentlemen here not to assail it for the mere sake of making captious criticism. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MCSHANE. Mr. Speaker, the object of the amendment which I have offered is that all public lands, both timber and prairie lands, shall be taken up exclusively under the homestead laws.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MCSHANE, it was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to strike out the section and insert the substitute which has been read.

Mr. HERMANN. I have sent to the desk an amendment designed to perfect that substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman did not submit it in the regular way. Does he offer it now?

Mr. HERMANN. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the substitute add the following:

"Provided, That no person, corporation, or association shall own, including any purchase under this act, an aggregate amount exceeding 640 acres of timber at the time of purchase; and proof to this effect shall be made before the register and receiver at the time of purchase."

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask unanimous consent to occupy five minutes in explaining my amendment, which seeks to perfect this substitute.

Mr. MACDONALD. If I understand aright, the provision of that amendment is already a part of the substitute.

Mr. HERMANN. It is not. I offer the amendment in good faith to perfect the substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN] to occupy five minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MACDONALD. In order that we may understand the question which the gentleman is about to discuss, I would like to have the substitute read in connection with the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HERMANN. That would come out of my time, and I prefer first to make my explanation, to which I invite the kind attention of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. Speaker, I understand it is the desire of the Committee on Public Lands to confine the purchase of timber lands to tracts not exceeding 640 acres for any one person or association.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

Mr. HERMANN. But I think a strict construction of this section or substitute will not carry out that object; in other words, I think that without my amendment a large number of persons who are already owners of an indefinite amount of lands will be allowed to come in and compete with others who are not the possessors of timber lands.

This is the language, that no corporation shall purchase or hold a greater quantity of such timber land than four quarter-sections. My amendment is that no person or corporation shall hold 640 acres of land by purchase from the United States, but that the purchase shall not exceed 160 acres. It is similar to the restriction in the additional homestead. There any person may acquire an additional homestead which may be vacant and may adjoin.

Now, a man owning 100,000 acres of timber land may come in and purchase 640 acres additional. My amendment only allows a man to purchase in addition to what he owns what will make 640 acres, and not more. It is calculated to create more equality in this regard.

Mr. HERMANN'S amendment was agreed to.

The substitute of Mr. STONE, of Missouri, as amended, was agreed to.

Section 5 was read, as follows:

SEC. 5. That before any sale of timber as above provided for shall be made, notice thereof shall be given by the Secretary of the Interior for at least ninety days in two newspapers of general circulation printed and published in the State or Territory, one of which shall be published in the land district in which the same is situated, describing by numbers the tracts of land on which the same is situated and the location thereof, and designating the land office of the district in which the land is situated as the place where such sealed proposals will be received, and stating the time within which such sealed proposals will be received. All such sales shall be for cash, payable at the time of sale at the land office of this district in which the land is situated, and the proceeds shall be accounted for by the receiver of such land office as the proceeds of the sale of public lands are now required by law to be accounted for.

Mr. TOOLE'S amendment was read, as follows:

Amend section 5 by adding thereto the following:

"Provided, That it shall be lawful for the residents of either of the States of Colorado or Nevada, or either of the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Wyoming, Dakota, Idaho, and Montana, to cut and remove timber on the public domain under existing law and the regulations thereunder for the period of six months after the passage of this act."

Mr. TOOLE. I think a brief statement will show the propriety of this amendment. The section provides these lands shall be classified as timber lands, and then they shall be advertised for a period of three months. So if this section becomes the law the result will be that there will be a period of time between the passage of the law and the time in which these lands shall be classified and ninety days thereafter during which it will be impossible to procure timber in any of the States or Territories named in this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no serious objection to that.

Mr. TOOLE'S amendment was agreed to.

Section 6 was read, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the timber so sold on any tract of land as above provided for shall be removed from the land, and from the public domain, within five years from the date of the sale thereof, and not afterward. The rights acquired by any such purchaser of the timber on any tract of public land shall be the ownership of such timber and the right to remove the same from such land within the period above specified, and any necessary use of the land incident thereto, subject to the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, which timber and right of removal shall be deemed personal property for all purposes, including taxation: Provided, however, That any tract of land the timber on which shall be sold, if found to be mineral land, shall, notwithstanding such sale, be subject to entry under the laws in force in relation to mineral lands, but such sale of the land as mineral land shall in no wise impair the rights of the purchaser to such timber thereon and to remove the same within the period hereinbefore specified. But no person, company, or corporation shall purchase or hold in any State or Territory a greater quantity of such timber than the timber on four quarter-sections of land.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I ask by unanimous consent the last sentence, beginning with the word "but," be stricken out, it having been incorporated in section 5.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HERMANN'S amendment was read, as follows:

On line 18, page 4, strike out the words "or hold."

On line 20, page 4, strike out "four" and insert "one;" so as to read "one quarter-section."

On line 20, page 4, insert the following after the word "land:"

"Provided, That an actual settler or owner of farm or grazing lands shall have the preference right to purchase not to exceed 160 acres of such timber lands which shall adjoin his own lands at $1.25 per acre, and the adverse applicant shall first serve notice on said settler or owner of his said application, after which the said settler or owner shall have ninety days within which to exercise his preference right of purchase or entry."

Mr. HERMANN. That has been withdrawn. I now move, in line 3, section 6, to strike out "five" and insert "forty." This is to enlarge the time within which the timber shall be removed. Instead of limiting it to five I propose to extend the time to forty years.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is too long.

Mr. HERMANN. Five years is too short a time. He ought to have thirty or forty years to use the timber in connection with the farm, and for household purposes.

Mr. WEAVER. But he purchases the timber on the land, not the land.

Mr. HERMANN. That is true, but still he ought to have time——

Mr. HOLMAN. But the gentleman will observe that you should not so extend the time as to warrant speculators in purchasing these lands. The object in limiting the time was to prevent speculation. That was the very purpose the committee had in view.

Mr. HERMANN. I think, if the gentleman from Indiana will permit me to make the suggestion, that without some such provision as I have indicated in this act it might as well be called an act to promote speculation in timber lands and to denude the forests of the United States of America.

Mr. HOLMAN. But we limit the amount of lands which can be purchased under the timber-land act.

Mr. HERMANN. Yes; but take the case of a large milling interest that purchases timber, we will say on 640 acres, and have but five years in which to remove the growth. The expiration of that period is about reached, there is no special demand for the timber, but the mill company will cut it all off, cut every tree down, manufacture it into lumber, even if they have to house it or put it in sheds rather than lose the chance of being able to make something out of their purchase.

Mr. HOLMAN. But they will not seek to get hold of timber lands, hoping that it will increase in value to any considerable extent.

Mr. HERMANN. They may do it with the hope of shutting others out; but at all events they will cut the timber down even if they have to shed or house it in order to protect their purchase.

And what do you accomplish by reducing the time to so short a period? The man who purchases his farm and has in his neighborhood a tract of 160 acres of timber lands needs fire-wood; he may purchase the land for that purpose, but before he could possibly consume the fire-wood upon the land another person comes in and outbids him.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the purpose for which he wants the timber is as you suggest, he will get it free anyway.

Mr. HERMANN. Well, take it for building purposes, for fencing around the farm, and for purposes generally of the farm. And permit me just in this connection to call the attention of the committee to a communication from a surveyor out in that country who writes to me from Oregon, and gives his objection to some of the features of this bill. He says:

> It seems to me to have some very objectionable features, especially in regard to selling the timber, only allowing six years to remove it. The result will be to throw all the timber into the hands of the mill-owners and monopolists.
> The mill-men and their henchmen will buy what they can saw, and the poor man who purchases a little timber can let his stand until the six years are out and see it revert to Government to be bought by some one else.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MACDONALD. I will now take the floor and yield to the gentleman to answer a question.

Mr. HERMANN. If the gentleman will yield to me I will take great pleasure in answering any question he may desire to ask.

Mr. MACDONALD. This is the question: Suppose, in connection with the argument you make, the land was in the proximity of the farmer, how would you have the settler to exercise his preference right?

Mr. HERMANN. Just as he does now, by being a bidder for the land. That is the only way he can exercise his preference right.

Mr. MACDONALD. That is, by bidding more than the other man.

Mr. HERMANN. That is the only way he can get the land.

Mr. PAYSON. Now, while the gentleman is answering questions, will he answer this suggestion: Since he supposes that the business of farming is abandoned and the farmer goes to speculating in the market and buying up timber land, is it not true that the moment he does so he ceases to be a farmer and becomes a speculator at once?

Mr. HERMANN. It is very rarely done. When the farmer converts himself into a millman there are some peculiar reasons for it. There are few instances where it is done, because the profits are not sufficient.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HERMANN, it was rejected.

The Clerk read section 7 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause examinations to be made of the public lands bearing timber to ascertain and properly designate the lands which by the provisions of this act are classified as timber land, and for that purpose may employ the services of the land inspectors now authorized by law in the administration of the public land service. Each of said timber inspectors shall be assigned to such district of timber lands as the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, shall designate, who, in addition to such classification of the timber lands of such district, and proper designation thereof as such, shall appraise the timber on each 40-acre tract classified as timber land, according to the legal subdivisions in such district, at the fair cash value thereof, and make return thereof as the Secretary of the Interior shall direct; but such appraisement and classification shall not be conclusive. And the Secretary of the Interior shall, with the approval of the President, prescribe all rules necessary and proper to carry the provisions of this act touching timber lands into effect.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now offer on behalf of the committee an amendment to restore to this section the words which were stricken out in committee, which I ask the Clerk to read:

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "service," in the seventh line, insert:

"And not exceeding three additonal land inspectors, each of whom, including those now authorized by law, shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum and necessary expenses when traveling in the performance of their duties, all of whom shall be annually appointed by the President, and shall take and subscribe an oath for the faithful performance of the duties of their office."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. TOOLE, as follows:

Insert the words "and mineral" after the word "timber," in line 2.

Mr. TOOLE. I withdraw that amendment, and also the several other amendments that I have offered to this section bearing upon the same point.

The Clerk reported the amendment proposed by Mr. CAREY, as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of section 7 the following:

"Provided, That sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 shall not apply to any timber lands in the Territory of Wyoming."

The amendment was rejected.

Sections 8 and 9 were read, as follows:

SEC. 8. That the President of the United States may from time to time set apart and reserve, in any State or Territory having public lands bearing forests, any part of the public lands designated in this act as timber lands, or any lands wholly or in part covered with timber or undergrowth, whether of commercial value or not, as public reservations, on which the tree and undergrowth shall be protected from waste or injury, under the charge of the Secretary of the Interior; and the President shall, by public proclamation, declare the establishment of such reservations and the limits thereof, and may employ such portion of the military forces as may be necessary or practicable in protecting such or any other reservations, or any other public timber land from waste or injury; and all the provisions of this act, or of any law touching the public domain which relates to timber lands, shall be subordinate to the provisions of this section.

SEC. 9. That in all surveys of the public lands hereafter made the deputy surveyors shall note in the field-notes, and designate on the township plats, each 40 acres of land, according to the legal subdivisions, bearing timber of commercial value, and as near as may be the portion of each of such 40 acres bearing such timber, and also each 40-acre tract bearing timber or undergrowth not of commercial value and the extent thereof. The Commissioner of the General Land Office shall prescribe rules for giving effect to this section.

Mr. GAY. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 shall not apply to any land, timber or otherwise, in the parish of Calcasieu, Louisiana, which are subject to entry by actual settlers under the homestead act only in tracts not exceeding 160 acres each.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will not press that amendment, because the bill can not be applicable if these lands are adapted to any character of agriculture. As it is, this applies only to lands not adapted to agriculture, except only as to the power of the President to withdraw land from sale and to set apart certain lands for timber reservations, in which the whole country is deeply interested. I do not see that there is any need for the amendment.

Mr. GAY. Mr. Speaker, if the provisions of these sections do not apply to agricultural lands which may now have more or less timber upon them, then of course my amendment is unnecessary. I wish to say that these are all agricultural lands. They are partly covered with timber, not of very great value. Some of them have no timber upon them. But that parish is now the center of a large immigration from Iowa and other Northwestern States, coming to Louisiana for the benefit of a milder climate in which to secure homes. It would be very injurious to have these lands complicated with the provisions of this bill and withdrawn from the market and subject to five years delay. More than that, because it will take a long time under the provisions of this bill before the Department of the Interior is properly advised by examination whether these lands are agricultural, whether they have timber upon them worth preserving, or otherwise.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that these immigrants find a means of support in this timber at the beginning. They put a part of the land in cultivation immediately, and as fast as they can cut the timber off they have the advantage of the timber, which enables them to erect their habitations and to secure and improve their homes.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will observe this bill does not reach those lands at all. Those lands being agricultural lands are expressly excepted.

Mr. GAY. Then there should be no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The only objection would be that we would have to cut the whole bill up into fragments.

Mr. GAY. I would like to have that portion of my district positively excepted and not complicated at all with doubt upon this question.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. McRAE. My friend may rest assured that the bill will not affect any agricultural lands. It is as broad as it can be. All lands that are fit for agriculture may be taken under the homestead law. His land can not be classified as timber or mineral land.

Mr. GAY. Homestead entries are the only kind of entries I believe in.

Mr. McRAE. That is all we seek to give you.

Mr. GAY. But I fear that under the provisions of this law the lands in question will not be allowed to be entered.

Mr. HOLMAN. A vast body of land is left in exactly the same condition as it was before. To those lands we apply the homestead principle. That, I think, is the corner-stone of this bill.

Mr. GAY. These are not mountain lands and they are not coal lands. There are no minerals in my country. They are more or less timber lands. I desire to have the right of settlement go on. Therefore I offer this amendment, which I think is germane. If there is no provision in this bill conflicting with it, then the amendment will do no harm.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know; but every other section will insist on coming in and suggesting provisions. This matter is already provided for in the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read section 10 of the bill; also an amendment offered by Mr. TOOLE, as follows:

Add the following to section 10:

"That in order to determine what lands may lawfully be selected, certified, or patented under grants made by Congress to each and every of the several land-grant railroads of the United States, and to which patent has not heretofore issued, such railroad company or corporation shall, by its agent thereto authorized in writing, file with the register and receiver of the land office in which such land is situated an affidavit that the land claimed or selected and each legal subdivision thereof is non-mineral in character, as contemplated by the grant, and that the affiant has made a personal inspection of said land; and thereupon the register and receiver of the land office in which said land is situated shall cause to be published in a newspaper of general circulation, published nearest the land so claimed or selected, for four successive weeks a notice that such affidavit has been filed, and at any time within thirty days thereafter any citizen of the State or Territory within which said land is situated may deny the allegation of non-mineral in said affidavit upon oath; and thereupon the same proceedings shall be had and obtain as in other contested cases, including the right of appeal by either party, but the burden of proving the non-mineral character of the land shall be upon the railroad company; and in all such contests it shall be sufficient to reject the claim or selection of any railroad company if it appears from the proof that the land contains lodes of mineral-bearing matter, which does not pass by the grant, whether it has been worked or not, or whether it will pay or not to work at the time of the contest. As between the railroad company and the Government any and all land that bears mineral which does not pass by the grant, or gold in placer form in such appreciable quantities as to render it in any sense valuable so as to be likely to be sought out for its mineral qualities, shall be considered within the exception made by Congress and shall be considered mineral lands.

Mr. TOOLE. This amendment becomes necessary for the following reason: Under the charter of the Northern Pacific Railroad and others they are given in their grant coal and iron, but all other minerals are expressly excepted from the grant. The surveyors-general of several of the States and Territories, in the early days, before the character of the country was known, acting in collusion with the railroad companies, returned large quantities of mineral land, land bearing gold, silver, and copper, as agricultural land. These lands have been certified to the railroad companies.

The object in passing this amendment is to compel those companies to comply with the terms and intention of the grant, namely, that they shall not take any of the mineral lands by grant.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOOLE. I ask unanimous consent that that amendment may be transferred to whatever place in the bill may be deemed appropriate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be made a separate section between sections 2 and 3, as the bill now stands.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read section 11 of the bill.

Mr. McRAE. I have an amendment proposed by the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Amendments are to be considered in the order of their presentation.

Mr. PAYSON. By unanimous consent, when the bill was first called for consideration to-day, it was ordered that amendments should be considered in the order in which they would logically apply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not then in the chair.

Mr. McRAE. My amendment does not conflict with the present amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the amendment now.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after "so," in the sixth line of the eleventh section: "Preference being given to persons residing upon or owning improvements thereon."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent to have a resolution passed which I send to the Clerk's desk, providing for having 2,000 more copies of the bill printed. We have entirely exhausted the edition, and if we are going on to-morrow we ought to have more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That request will be entertained later.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

By Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin:

Amend section 11 in the third line by striking out the words "private or."

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee why this land is to be sold at private sale.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was thought that was a matter that might be safely submitted to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner; that there might be cases where it would be proper to sell at private sale, especially if they were to give priority to the person who happened to be on the land.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. Since the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas, I see the appropriateness of the words "private or." Prior to that the wording did not seem right. I now withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

By Mr. CAREY:

Amend line 3 of section 11 by striking out the words "private" and "or," and by inserting in said line 3, section 11, between the word "sale" and the word "for," the words "after advertisement as provided for the sale of timber lands under the provisions of this act."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

By Mr. HERMANN:

On line 6, page 7, after the words "to do so," insert the words "subject to the rights of actual settlers to purchase or enter."

Mr. HERMANN. That point is already covered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is no objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read section 12 of the bill.

Mr. WEAVER. I have an amendment which I wish to offer if I can get the attention of the chairman of the committee. I think it ought to be adopted, and I do not know of any better place to insert it than here. I will read it before sending it to the Clerk.

Providing that along all water courses, lake and sea shores there shall be reserved to the United States for public use alternate strips of land 100 feet wide and 1,000 feet long; and all patents for land disposed of after the passage of this act shall expressly recite this reservation.

Mr. McADOO. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion—that the words "living springs" be inserted?

Mr. WEAVER. Do you say springs or streams?

Mr. McADOO. Springs and streams.

Mr. WEAVER. I do not think it best to put springs in.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. Would it not be well to say "navigable water streams?"

Mr. WEAVER. No; I think not. The object is to keep people from being fenced off from stock water and necessary water supply. I think this is a very important reservation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The amendment has not been reported from the desk.

Mr. WEAVER. Let it be made an independent section.

The Clerk reported the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My only trouble about that is it seems to be indefinite. Is it 1,000 feet on the water front? Which way does it lie?

Mr. WEAVER. Parallel with the stream.

Mr. BUCHANAN. One thousand feet along the stream?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It does not say so.

Mr. WEAVER. I will put it "parallel with the stream."

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will say to the gentleman that the reservation of the sea front for the purpose of watering stock——

Mr. WEAVER. There are a great many places where they can not get to the sea.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. Why would it not be wiser to make the amendment apply to each quarter-section?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope this proposition will be withheld for the present.

Mr. LAIRD. I hope it will not be adopted now or at any other time.

Mr. WEAVER. I am willing that the amendment be passed over for the present, to be considered hereafter at a proper time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa withdraw it for the present?

Mr. WEAVER. I am perfectly willing that it be passed over now by unanimous consent, with the understanding that we shall go back to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

Mr. McSHANE. Mr. Speaker, have all the amendments to section 11 been passed upon?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They have.

Mr. McSHANE. I ask unanimous consent to offer another amendment to section 11.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to recur to section 11 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. Let it be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2 strike out the words "one hundred and sixty" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

"That all isolated or disconnected tracts or parcels of the public domain less than 40 acres may be ordered sold at private or public sale for not less than $1.25 per acre by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, when in his judgment it would be proper to do so."

Mr. PAYSON. I have no objection to recurring to the section for the purpose of having the amendment offered. But the Committee on Public Lands had that proposition before it, investigated it thoroughly, and after information from the General Land Office, as well as personal information from gentlemen living in localities which would be affected by the provisions of the bill, it was unanimously agreed that 160 acres would be the proper amount. While I have no objection to the offering of the amendment, I think it ought to be voted down.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska will be considered as pending.

Mr. McRAE. I hope it will not be agreed to; it clearly ought not to be, because the land can be homesteaded now if any man wants to homestead it.

Mr. McSHANE. Mr. Speaker, this section will place hundreds of thousands of acres of land under the control of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to be placed on the market at private sale. Now, I understand the intention of this bill is to preserve as much of the public domain as possibly can be preserved for homestead entry. We all know that in many instances 120 acres of land are regarded as sufficient for a homestead entry. There are thousands of settlers who willingly make a filing upon 80 acres of land in close proximity to a railroad rather than go off 20 or 30 miles from a railroad and settle on 160 acres. Until a few years ago a settler could not file upon more than 80 acres within the 20-mile limit of a railroad, and that law was repealed only in 1880.

Mr. CHIPMAN. This bill provides that any tract of this character less than 160 acres may be sold in the manner provided. It covers your amendment.

Mr. McSHANE. But there might be a fraction of a quarter-section, embracing, we will suppose, 154 acres, which, under this section, the Commissioner of the General Land Office would be permitted to sell at public or private sale.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to suggest that this provision will apply only to cases where there has been in some form or other a reservation of a small, isolated body of land rendered valuable by being in the neighborhood of settlement.

Mr. McSHANE. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this section go a long way. They give authority to the Commissioner of the General Land Office to sell at public or private sale, whenever he sees fit, any parcel of land less than 160 acres. Surely the effect of this section will be to remove from the operation of the homestead act every fraction of a quarter-section, if there is anybody ready to purchase it and if the Commissioner of the General Land Office sees fit to sell it. I am in favor of preserving every fraction of a quarter-section in excess of 40 acres for settlement under the homestead laws.

Mr. LAIRD. Take, for instance, the Platte River, having a tortuous course, full of islands which embrace a large number of fractions of quarter-sections, marked on the Government plats as "lots." These may be valuable to the holder of contiguous property, but worthless to any person who might propose to take them up separately under his homestead or pre-emption right. What does the gentleman say as to those cases?

Mr. McSHANE. I presume that all those parcels of land to which the gentleman refers are less than 40 acres.

Mr. LAIRD. Oh, no.

Mr. PAYSON. We have information of very large numbers of such fractional tracts in Indiana and Illinois, outside of the meander lines of surveys, etc.

Mr. McSHANE. I will ask my colleague [Mr. LAIRD] whether it is not a fact that there are in Nebraska thousands of quarter-sections of land containing only from 152 to 158 acres?

Mr. LAIRD. I think that is the fact.

Mr. PAYSON. That is not a matter coming within the provisions of this section at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. They are not isolated.

Mr. McSHANE. They become isolated the moment the quarter-sections on each side of them are taken up.

Mr. LAIRD. I do not think the case presented by my colleague [Mr. McSHANE] is covered by this section.

Mr. PAYSON. Not at all.

Mr. McSHANE. The provisions of this section go much further, I apprehend, than they were intended to go by the committee in reporting the section. I have no objection to modifying the amendment by striking out "40" and inserting "80." I want to provide against including under this provision the short quarter-sections of which I have spoken.

Mr. LAIRD. I think that my colleague [Mr. McSHANE] sees this matter somewhat differently from the rest of us. It does not occur to me that the "short quarter-sections," which are short owing possibly to defects in surveys and not from natural causes, are comprehended under this section. But I can see this is a state of things where subdivisions are cut up and reduced below 160 and 80 acres. Along the Platte River there are a large number of fractional parts of land separated from the public lands and marked as lots. They comprehend a portion of the shore. Some of them are islands.

I have a bill before the Committee on Public Lands asking that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to advertise and sell these lands to particular holders. The land is more valuable to settlers near by than to those who are distant as it may be used for pasturage and like purposes.

Mr. MACDONALD. I was just waiting to see how long the gentleman would occupy the minute which I yielded to him. I think if my friends will reflect for a moment upon the purpose of the section they will agree that it shall remain as it is.

Any gentleman who has resided in a land-grant State as long a time as I have, from the time the Government offered land for sale down to the present hour, will realize fully the necessity of such a provision as the one provided in the pending section. Although lands in the country where I live have been out of the market over twenty years, there are one or two isolated tracts there yet of marsh land which have become valuable on account of drainage constantly going on. Throughout the West there are tracts of land of 8 or 10 acres which still remain undisposed of. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. McRAE. I want to say, in the Southern public land States, the States where public lands have been nearly disposed of—in Arkansas Missouri, in the northern part of Louisiana, and the northern part of Mississippi—this section is a necessity. A great part of the land has not been taken because it is unfit for cultivation; that is, unfit for a homestead. This section was draughted to enable the Department to dispose of the land in any way to accommodate those who may desire a part of these lands. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. In fact, the Representatives of those States could not afford to give a hearty support to this bill if this section was taken out of it.

Mr. LAIRD. I say preference should be given to the men owning abutting or adjoining lands.

Mr. McRAE. He makes out his application to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the latter can sell it whenever he is convinced it is for the interest of the Government to do so.

Mr. LAIRD. But preference in the sale of such lands is always to be given to the owners of the nearest abutting lands.

Mr. McSHANE. I desire to change my amendment so it will read 80 instead of 160 acres. And I wish, Mr. Chairman, to impress on this House the fact that in the Western States a very large portion of the surveyed sections run short in the number of acres. In those States containing 158 or 159 acres the Commissioner of the General Land Office can offer the same for sale.

Mr. PAYSON. In many portions of the West, as stated by the gentleman from Nebraska, there are fractional or isolated tracts of land.

A MEMBER. What do you mean by isolated?

Mr. PAYSON. I will state what isolated is. An isolated tract of land is understood to be, in public-land parlance, a piece of land which stands disconnected from other public lands having been disposed of by the Government, or land when disconnected by reason of its proximity to a stream or surrounded by water, as in the case of an island. That is what I mean by isolated land.

Mr. McSHANE. I understand the gentleman. In other words, take the lands located within the limits of a land-grant railroad, where the odd sections are granted to the railroads, leaving a section of Government land surrounded by four sections of railroad land. That section is short in the number of acres it contains. Whenever three-fourths of that section is settled on the other quarter is subject to the provisions of this section.

Mr. PAYSON. Precisely.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I think not.

Mr. McSHANE. There is no question about it.

Mr. PAYSON. Concede that it is; what is the objection? The general law operates in regard to it, and any homesteader or pre-emptor can take it up. This is not a repeal of the general law. It is simply an addition to that law which is not supplanted by it. If no homesteader or pre-emptor takes it, all we do is to say that the Commissioner of the General Land Office may sell it at private sale after giving the right of purchasing to the owner of the nearest adjacent land.

Mr. MCSHANE. There is no provision in this bill giving the first right to the homesteader.

Mr. PAYSON. No, for the general law does that.

Mr. MCSHANE. But it provides that whenever the fraction of a quarter-section becomes isolated the Commissioner may offer it for sale.

Mr. PAYSON. But that does not prevent the homesteader from taking it. There is simply a discretion given to the Commissioner to sell it if no one else takes it under the general law.

Mr. MCSHANE. This gives too much discretion to the Commissioner of the Public Lands; it places too many acres of the public domain on the market for sale. It is the objectionable feature of this section; and I hope the amendment will be adopted reducing the amount to a fraction of 80 instead of 160 acres.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MCSHANE, the House divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 11.

Mr. MCRAE. No quorum.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. I think we have been in session long enough to-night. Let us take a recess now until half past 10 to-morrow.

Mr. HERMANN. No; I object to any recess.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House take a recess until 10 o'clock.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask consent to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Arkansas, and I ask his attention for a moment.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the pending proposition be passed without prejudice, to be called up at a later stage in the consideration of the bill when there is a fuller attendance of the members.

Mr. MCRAE. I can not consent to that, as I may not be here. This is a matter that the representatives of five of the public-land States can not possibly concede. They can not support the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. But this amendment does not seem to make it so objectionable.

Mr. MCRAE. I know what the amendment means. We can not support the bill with that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON]?

Mr. MCSHANE. I object.

Mr. PAYSON. Does the gentleman object to passing it over without prejudice?

Mr. MCSHANE. I do, for I may not be here to-morrow, and I want to say here again that the State that I in part have the honor to represent has many millions of acres of unoccupied Government lands.

Mr. PAYSON. This clause of the bill will not affect that.

Mr. WEAVER. Yes, because there are a great many fractional sections.

Mr. MCSHANE. And I can not consent to have such a large body of lands put in the hands of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for sale and subject to his discretion. We want to preserve them for homestead settlers.

Mr. PAYSON. But I think the gentleman is mistaken about the effect of it in that respect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman objects.

Mr. HOLMAN addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. MCRAE and Mr. MCSHANE were appointed tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is obvious that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WEAVER. I move that the House take a recess until half past 10 o'clock.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was rejected.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. WEAVER that the House take a recess.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It will take a quorum to do that.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 15, noes 8.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made that a quorum has not voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. WEAVER were appointed tellers.

Mr. MACDONALD. I ask consent to offer an amendment which will meet the objection of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is a pending motion on which no quorum has voted.

Mr. WEAVER. I withdraw the motion for a recess.

Mr. MACDONALD. I propose to add to this section these words:

Provided, That lands shall not become so isolated or disconnected until the same have been subject to homestead entry for a period of two years after the surrounding land has been disposed of by the Government in any manner.

Mr. WEAVER. That, I think, meets the objection.

Mr. MCSHANE. With an amendment fixing it at three years, I will accept that.

Mr. MACDONALD. Very well; I will so modify the amendment.

The amendment as modified was adopted.

Mr. LAIRD. Now I submit this amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To what section?

Mr. LAIRD. To section 11. I understand Mr. MCRAE to be willing to accept this as it simply completes the matter.

Mr. MCRAE. I have no objection. My amendment has been adopted.

Mr. LAIRD. It is as follows: Add to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas:

Provided, That in the absence of any resident, preference in sale of the same—

Referring to an isolated piece of land—shall be given where practicable to the owner of the nearest abutting land, said owner to have six months in which to make such purchase.

Mr. MCRAE. I think the "six months" ought to be stricken out. The preference is given and the time ought to come under the discretion vested in the Commissioner.

Mr. LAIRD. I do not care about that. Let it be stricken out.

The Clerk reported the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 13 of the bill; also the following amendment, offered by Mr. BIGGS:

Amend section 13, line 3, by striking out "three hundred and twenty" and inserting "six hundred and forty."

Mr. MCKENNA. My colleague, the mover of that amendment, was unable to be here to-night. He therefore requested me to ask unanimous consent that it be passed over, and returned to upon the next consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection, provided we do not get through the bill to-night.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I would like to have Mr. BIGGS here to-night. If the bill is not finished to-night, but is passed over, I do not want to waive any right to be heard upon that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will have the same right that he would have if the amendment was considered to-night.

The Clerk read section 14.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the word "affidavit," in line 3, down to and including the word "family," in line 4, on page 8.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. This amendment leaves out the words "that he or she is the head of a family." I do not think the lands should be restricted to persons who are the heads of families.

Mr. HOLMAN. The language is the same as that of the homestead law.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. There are many young men under twenty-one years of age who have no human being to depend on for their support. They are the most energetic and industrious people among us. It seems to me that this question should not be raised against them. I would like to see the law so amended that people of a younger age even than twenty-one shall have the right to enter the desert lands.

Mr. WEAVER. What age would you suggest?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. There are plenty of them out there eighteen years of age.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have adopted the language of the homestead law as near as may be.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read section 15.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I would like to offer an amendment to add after the word "map" the words "or diagram." I am afraid this language might be construed to mean a regular map with distances, heights, etc., and that the settler would be put to too much expense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 16; also the amendment by Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin, as follows:

Amend section 16 by adding to the end of same:

"Provided, however, That the Government of the United States may, at any time whenever the public interest may require, enter upon a system of irrigation, and may by purchase or condemnation acquire all irrigating canals, ditches, and reservoirs provided for in this act, and as may be found necessary for a complete system of irrigation, and the title of waters that may or can be used for irrigation shall remain in the United States."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read section 17.

Mr. HOLMAN. I see in line 22, after the word "land," there is a word omitted. It is the word "has." If there is no objection, that should be inserted.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

Section 17, in lines 8 and 9, strike out "three hundred and twenty" and insert "six hundred and forty."

Mr. MCKENNA. I make the same request in regard to this amendment as I made in regard to the other amendment, offered by Mr. BIGGS. If there is no objection, I should like to have it passed over.

There was no objection, and the amendment was passed over.

Mr. LAIRD. I desire to amend line 26 of this bill by inserting, after the word "time," the word "naturalized;" so that the section will read "at that time naturalized citizens of the United States."

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not the same thing?

Mr. LAIRD. I think not. A man can be a citizen of the United States in contemplation of the homestead law and not be a naturalized citizen.

Mr. PAYSON. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska should prevail, it strikes me it will restrict the provisions of this section to naturalized citizens. Certainly the gentleman does not intend that the benefits of the section shall only go to foreign-born people who have become naturalized.

Mr. LAIRD. The benefits would only go to naturalized citizens.

Mr. PAYSON. You do not mean that.

Mr. LAIRD. No; I mean aliens that have acquired naturalization, not merely admission to vote in a State.

Mr. HOLMAN. The language is just as broad as it can be. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read section 18; also the following amendment:

By Mr. LAIRD:

Amend section 18 by adding at the end thereof the following: "The time which the homestead settler has served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps shall be deducted from the time heretofore required to perfect title, or if discharged on account of wounds received or disability incurred in the line of duty, then the term of enlistment shall be deducted from the time heretofore required to perfect title without reference to the length of time he may have served; but no patent shall issue to any homestead settler who has not resided upon, improved, and cultivated his homestead for a period of at least one year after he shall have commenced his improvements: Provided, That homestead entries can be commuted to cash entries after actual inhabitancy of the land sought to be entered by the homesteader and his improvement and cultivation of it for a period of one year."

Mr. LAIRD. I withdraw part of the amendment which has already been provided for, and only desire to offer the proviso.

[Mr. LAIRD withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. LAIRD, it was rejected, there being—ayes 5, noes 18.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That sections 2288 and 2290 in said chapter No. 5 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, amended so that it shall read as follows:

"SEC. 2289. Every person who is the head of a family or who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and is a citizen of the United States, or who has filed his declaration of intention to become such, as required by the naturalization laws, shall be entitled to enter one quarter-section or a less quantity of unappropriated public lands, to be located in a body in conformity to the legal subdivisions of the public lands; but no person who is the proprietor of 160 acres of land in any State or Territory, or who quits and abandons his residence on his own land to reside on the public lands in the same State or Territory, shall acquire any right under the homestead law. And every person owning and residing on land may, under the provisions of this section, enter other land lying contiguous to his land, which shall not, with the land so already owned and occupied, exceed in the aggregate 160 acres."

SEC. 2290. That any person applying to enter land under the preceding section shall first make and subscribe before the proper officer and file in the proper land office an affidavit that he or she is the head of a family, or is over twenty-one years of age, and that such application is honestly and in good faith made for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, and not for the benefit of any other person, persons, corporation, or syndicate, and that he or she will faithfully and honestly endeavor to comply with all the requirements of law as to settlement, residence, and cultivation necessary to acquire title to the land applied for; that he or she is not acting as agent of any person, corporation, or syndicate in making such entry, nor in collusion with any person, corporation, or syndicate, to give them the benefit of the land entered, or any part thereof, or the timber thereon; that he or she does not apply to enter the same for the purpose of speculation, but in good faith to obtain a home for himself, or herself, and family; and that he or she has not directly or indirectly made, and will not make, any agreement or contract in any way or manner, with any person or persons, corporation, or syndicate whatsoever, by which the title which he or she might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure, in whole or in part, to the benefit of any person, except himself, or herself, and family; and upon filing such affidavit with the register or receiver on payment of $5 when the entry is of not more than 80 acres, and on payment of $10 when the entry is for more than 80 acres, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the amount of land specified.

Amend section 19 as follows, namely:

Strike out all after "United States," in line 7, all of line 8, and the words "laws" and "one quarter-section," in line 9, and insert in line 9, in lieu of the words stricken out, "80 acres."

Mr. JACKSON. The first part of the amendment I have proposed is embraced, I understand, in an amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] which has not yet been disposed of, and which, I believe, he desires to discuss.

Mr. PAYSON. No, sir; that amendment applied to an earlier section of the bill; and the House voted it down, in the absence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON. That matter having been passed upon, I do not care to speak upon it, and will withdraw that part of my amendment, if I may be permitted to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can withdraw any portion of his amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. Upon the other part of my amendment, striking out "one quarter-section" and inserting in lieu thereof "80 acres," I desire to have an expression of the opinion of the House.

I believe that all gentlemen who have given study to the subject of the proper disposition of the lands belonging to the Government are agreed that the homestead land law has furnished the best means of putting the title of the Government lands in the hands of the actual settler. In my judgment we have reached a time in the history of the Government when the quantity of land granted as a homestead may very properly be reduced.

I conclude this for the reason that the number of citizens of the United States who are landless to-day has increased in late years proportionately very greatly; and that the number who own in the settled States less than 160 acres has also increased much greater relatively in recent years than formerly.

And, Mr. Speaker, while the law has permitted ever since the enactment of the homestead bill the taking of 160 acres of land of the public domain, we ought not to forget that other portions of the country were settled in much smaller bodies. The older States of the Union, known as the Eastern and Middle States, were largely settled in not exceeding 100, and perhaps less, acre tracts, and I understand that Indiana was settled in lots of 40 acres. I think that the period has now arrived when we can see that at no great distance in the future the time will present itself when the Government of the United States will have no good lands to give, and therefore we ought to reduce the quantity that may be taken up by settlers as homesteads.

The frauds that have been perpetrated under the homestead law, it I may be permitted to observe, largely grew out of the fact that 160 acres of land was permitted to be taken up. Quantities of land were often obtained through fraudulent entries made readily by men (under contracts with two or three or more citizens) who took up the lands and afterwards transferred them; and thereby large bodies of land have been acquired, not by actual settlers. But if the quantity was reduced to 80 acres there would be that much less of inducement to perpetrate fraud.

Mr. WHEELER was recognized, and yielded his time.

Mr. JACKSON. A moment more. The subject preceding this, disposed of by the House, leads me to believe that if the attention of the committee was given to this section they would be disposed to limit the quantity to be taken under homestead entry in the manner suggested.

The committee, I see, are opposed to the commutation feature of the law, and I agree with them in that respect; that is, against allowing these homestead entries to be commuted and paid for before the expiration of the time required by the law. We all agree that the proper form is to take the lands from Government and place them in the hands of actual settlers; and having this in view, I ask careful attention to the propriety of limiting the homesteads in future to 80 acres.

We are, in a very few years, likely to have great trouble in this country growing out of the fact that we have a large and increasing body of landless citizens; and the time has come when we should change our ideas in reference to the disposal of the public lands. We have always had the idea apparently in the disposal of these public lands, too long has it existed among us, and it is occasionally advanced here that the main effort on the part of Congress should be to facilitate their disposal as rapidly as possible, as if it was something of an advantage to the Government to get rid of these lands and give the title to somebody. I think now the legislative brakes ought to be put down, and we ought to turn our attention for awhile to the other direction of how we may best save the lands for the generation coming upon the stage and which is to follow us.

I would not prevent men who want lands for actual purposes of occupancy for farms from acquiring them; but I think 80 acres is a sufficiently large quantity of land, a good-sized farm. In most of the older States 80 acres is far above the average of the farm.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would suggest that you have no children there.

Mr. JACKSON. Why, my dear sir, the gentleman was never more mistaken in his life. We have children in sufficient number to send a great many out to your country to settle it and people it. It is generally understood that you get your settlers largely from the eastern part of the country, and I have no doubt that the gentleman himself first saw the light somewhere in the East. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

[Mr. LAIRD withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VANDEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the whole of the proviso in this section on the fourteenth page, beginning in the sixth line and going down to and including the fourteenth line.

Mr. Speaker, I think at this late hour of the night it is hardly worth while for me to attempt any considerable discussion of this important question. Certainly in the limited time assigned to me I can scarcely more than state the question; but as an exemplification of the vicious character of this proviso I will only call the attention of the House to what has actually taken place in the district I represent under the desert-land act.

This desert-land act was passed on the 3d day of March, 1877. Within sixty days from the time of the passage of the act, in the district I represent, in upper San Joaquin valley nearly 400,000 acres of land were located upon under the provisions of the act, and almost immediately the parties who made the location transferred and assigned the land to other parties. To-day the land is held by a syndicate that has never paid but 25 cents an acre for the land. The parties who made the location were dummies. It is not exactly a desert country, such as was described by the gentleman on my right, but it is the very garden spot of Southern California.

Many of these lands that are so held under the desert-land entries of eleven years ago to-day to the actual settlers would be worth a thousand dollars an acre, and yet they are called desert lands. It is a dangerous thing to put in this section of the bill a proviso recognizing the right of a man who makes a desert-land entry to assign before he acquires title to his land. The act of the 3d of March, 1877, provides specifically that the person making the settlement must make it for himself alone; but the law has been so perverted that the syndicate to which I have referred have held nearly 400,000 acres of land.

Mr. HOLMAN. And that in a single county.

Mr. VANDEVER. And they own other land in addition to the three or four hundred thousand acres. They have appropriated all the water there is in that country. They own the water and they own the land. They stand there like cormorants and keep it from the honest settlers.

I understood the chairman of the committee to say here to-night that the object of this bill is to secure these lands to the actual settlers. But he inserts in the bill a vicious amendment which neutralizes that idea.

Mr. HEARD. If I am recognized, Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VANDEVER. It is not the time nor the occasion to make any extended remarks; but I am painting no fancy picture. I am stating facts in regard to this matter. Since I have been here I have made it my business to wait upon the Secretary of the Interior and the Land Department and to address communication after communication to get the facts into that office. To this day not one finger has been lifted in that Department towards the rectification of this great fraud practiced upon the settlers of the country.

Mr. LAIRD. They have been using their spies on us out there.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. VANDEVER] will bear in mind that a very large portion of these desert-land entries are suspended in the Land Office and the subject is being investigated.

Mr. VANDEVER. I understand that. The great point is that we want the 300,000 acres thus suspended restored to the public domain, so that the honest settler may have an opportunity of going upon it and getting a homestead.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is being brought about as rapidly as possible.

Mr. VANDEVER. When the settler comes in and asks permission to locate upon this land he is told in the local land office it is no longer public land, it does not belong to the body of the public land, and he has no right to file upon it. He is shut off. A wall of adamant is raised around it. It is one of the most difficult things in the world, almost impossible, to beat that idea into the head of the Interior Department or into the head of the Land Office, to make them understand the frauds that are being practiced at this hour under their very jurisdiction by connivance of the subordinates in their offices that they ought to control.

Now, what I fear in regard to this matter is that if we recognize in this bill the right of a man under the desert-land act to assign his title before he has perfected it, it may be claimed that this is a recognition of the right of those locators in 1877 to assign their title to the syndicates that claim to hold them to-day. This is a matter of very great importance to the people of that country. There is a crying evil there which they charge upon the present administration of the Land Office and of the Interior Department.

There is no politics in this matter. There is a great wrong to be righted, and whoever may be responsible for the perpetration of the wrong, whatever may be the party to which he belongs, I say we should apply the principle that "no guilty man shall escape." I therefore call the attention of the committee and the House to the propriety of striking this provision from section 20 of the bill.

Mr. LAIRD. May I ask the gentleman a question? Outside of the possible effects of this section upon the existing condition of things described by the gentleman, what does he say about its mischievous effects in prospective?

Mr. VANDEVER. That we can only infer.

Mr. LAIRD. What do you say about that?

Mr. VANDEVER. I think it will be just as mischievous in the future as this practice of the Department has been in the past, laying the foundation for neutralizing the beneficial effects of this bill, designed by the committee which reported it.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. VANDEVER] has related very glaring cases of fraud, which, if they exist, and are permitted to exist without redress under any administration, must be a disgrace to that administration. But, sir, to state that frauds have existed under the previous law is no condemnation of this provision. And if gentlemen will pause a moment to contemplate what they intend by a gift of desert land or by a right of parties to acquire desert-land, and will then look further to see how the gift is to be made available, they will discover that some such provision as this must be inserted, or the gift will be an entire disappointment to the person who is expected to receive it.

Desert land, as has been stated by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD], is not like agricultural land. You can not go upon it and from the very beginning have some prospect of a profit and benefit. You must employ capital upon it; you must bring water upon it; and until you do employ capital and bring water it is of no more use than is that bare floor for the production of any crop. Employ capital upon it, bring water, and it may be made productive.

Now, how is the settler going to employ capital upon this desert land when he has no capital? How is he going to put water upon it when he has not the means of bringing water there? How is he to accomplish this? He pledges his industry and his honesty to somebody who has the capital. This person sees that the settler is industrious and honest; he sees also that all the title and rights of the Government are made paramount to everything the settler does, are secured to the very end, and that the settler if he be industrious and honest, if he performs his duty to the land and to the Government, will be able to repay amply the advances of money which may be made to him. Thus the person who advances the money for the improvement of this desert land is secured by the pledge of one half of 320 acres.

We had this matter under consideration in the committee; we deliberated upon it thoroughly, and we could devise no other plan to make this an available offer on the part of the Government. We realized the existence of some objections to the provision of the bill; we realize those objections now, and if any other plan could have been suggested whereby the result could have been accomplished, we would gladly have adopted such a plan.

How is the Government to be defrauded under this provision? It grants 320 acres of land, arid land; as arid as that floor, so far as concerns the production of crops. It says to the settler, "Go there; employ your time; devote your industry; and if you reclaim that land, if you make it bloom and blossom, then we will grant you a gift of 320 acres; and in order to enable you to do this we will allow you to mortgage one-half of what you are to get." The title of the Government and the right of the Government are always paramount to any right of the mortgagee; the Government is always secure against any possible abuse.

I consulted my other colleagues from California about this measure, and I thought I had consulted my colleague who has just spoken [Mr. VANDEVER], but in this respect I must be mistaken. My judgment is that my other colleagues concur in the propriety of this provision. Such is my present recollection, although the chairman of the committee [Mr. HOLMAN] has just told me that some of them dissent from it. If they do they have not expressed their dissent to me.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not undertake to speak definitely on that subject.

Mr. VANDEVER. I would like to say a few words in response to my colleague [Mr. MCKENNA].

Mr. MCKENNA. The gentleman shall have ample opportunity for that. Between my colleague and myself there is no contention about this matter—certainly none on my part. My whole desire is, in the first place, to secure to the settler ample opportunity to realize the benefits of this gift of the Government; and, in the second place, to protect the Government against any possibility of being defrauded by such schemes as have been depicted by my colleague [Mr. VANDEVER].

I wish to say as to the lands in Kern County that they are not desert lands. It is land which is referred to as being as arid as this floor. It is very rich land and makes that country like a garden spot. It is agricultural land; but the parties constituting the syndicate in Southern California own three or four thousand acres of other lands, and they also monopolize the water which is necessary for irrigation. They monopolize the land and they also monopolize the water which is necessary to cultivate the land. Those who go there upon the land to settle have no water, and they have to depend for what they use upon this syndicate. As a result, this monopoly which owns the water and owns the surrounding land becomes the possessor, little by little, of all the lands in the country.

Mr. MCKENNA. Is not this proviso calculated to prevent abuse?

Mr. VANDEVER. I am not advocating the proviso, but opposing any provision by which the settler is allowed to mortgage his land before he acquires title to it. That is the worst part of this section.

There is an investigation going on in the Land Office in regard to this matter, which ought to have been inaugurated before this. It is of the highest importance this House should be informed before they adopt that proviso. It is a matter of importance to the community in which I live.

As I have already said, this land is not arid land. It is rich land and susceptible of the highest cultivation. Men are going there to settle upon these lands in large numbers; but they can not remain there unless they put themselves under obligation to this syndicate which owns all the water.

Mr. PAYSON. As a member of the committee reporting this provision, I desire to ask the gentleman this question.

Mr. VANDEVER. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. Does not this section provide that the mortgage shall be subject to the rights of the United States, and upon the performance of acts required to be done; that is to say, the mortgagee gets no rights from the Government until there is value?

Mr. VANDEVER. I have no doubt the provision may protect the Government, but my object is to protect the settler and keep him out of the clutches of the syndicate which is squeezing the life-blood out of him in that country.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I rise to submit a remark in the line suggested by my friend from Illinois. It seems to me this is practically a great ado about nothing. The desert-land laws under which these frauds complained of by the gentleman from California are practiced are repealed by this enactment if it should become a law.

In lieu of desert-land entries of 640 acres it is provided a person having proper qualifications may make a desert-land homestead entry of 320 acres, going upon the land and making his home there, filing maps and plans of irrigation at the time when he makes his final proof showing the plan has been substantially carried out and a certain portion of the land put in cultivation.

To enable him to do this it is provided in section 20 he may mortgage one-half of his claim of 320 acres, but reserves the rights of the Government. They are in no sense impaired. The right the Government may have is not diverted to the right of any mortgagee. On the contrary, the rights of the mortgagee are subordinate to the rights of the Government.

Now, I stated that it was an ado about nothing, because I can not conceive of any statute that could deny to the homesteader the right to mortgage to any party to whom he wanted to mortgage, not only one-half of the land, but the whole of it; and if he afterwards completes the homestead entry and obtains a patent the mortgage becomes valid.

Mr. McRAE. There is a statute against the mortgaging of lands of any sort under the homestead law.

Mr. LAIRD. The decisions are with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] on that proposition.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I was not aware of the existence of any such statute.

Mr. HOLMAN. You can not make any defense so far as the United States is concerned. It is entirely inoperative.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. It would not be inoperative in Indiana or Missouri. Do I understand that the mortgage would be inoperative and could not be enforced?

Mr. HOLMAN. It would be a question of the power of the homesteader in advance of his obtaining the patent.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Oh, yes; of course the office might decline to grant the patent. I understand that. But that is not the question presented here.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us have a vote.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VANDEVER. I did not withdraw my amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. VANDEVER, it was rejected.

Mr. MACDONALD. I now insist upon my motion to adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the Clerk read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21——

Mr. MACDONALD. I insist upon the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. If there is no further morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If there be none that order is closed. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read at length.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that as the reading progresses the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The formal reading will be dispensed with, if there be no objection, and the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. And that all the amendments of the committee be acted upon before other amendments shall be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is going a little too far. We may want to amend the amendments of the committee, or add something in the same connection; and therefore that privilege ought to be reserved in the usual course. I have nothing in thought myself but to keep it safe in hand.

Mr. HARRIS. An amendment to an amendment of the committee will be in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I make no request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. For street-car tickets for messenger service in the city of Washington, $40.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 18 of the amendment I move to strike out the words "outfit for printing small circulars."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that on pages 92 and 93 we struck out the provision there made for the Bureau of Labor, which was estimated for originally in the Book of Estimates under the Interior Department. At this session we have passed a law creating a Department of Labor, and we had a subsequent estimate covering the exact provisions of the new statute.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendments are concluded. Are there further amendments to be proposed by the Committee on Appropriations? If not, other amendments will be received.

Mr. BLAIR. By instruction of the Committee on Education and Labor I move, in the list of annual committee clerks, on page 4, line 8, after the word "Forestry," to insert the words:

Clerk to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I move to insert, immediately after the amendment just made, in line 8, on page 4, the words:

Clerk to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BECK. Is there any report of a committee urging that, or any special need for the clerk to remain here after the Committee on Territories go away? Why should he remain here during the vacation?

Mr. PLATT. There is a good deal more reason for it than for many other committees which have annual clerks.

Mr. BECK. But that does not answer the question. Does the committee remain here during the recess?

Mr. PLATT. The committee does not remain here during the recess——

Mr. BECK. Then why pay a clerk to remain here?

Mr. PLATT. Nor do over two of the committees remain here who have annual clerks.

Mr. BECK. Then it would be better to strike out a good many than to pay clerks to remain here when there is no need for them.

Mr. PLATT. If the committee will strike them out, I shall withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BECK. The committee has no right to strike them out.

Mr. PLATT. Yes, it has. The Committee on Territories is as old a committee as any in the Senate; it is as important as three-quarters of those which have annual clerks; it is as important as the Committee on Education and Labor, which has just been granted an annual clerk by an amendment adopted without objection, and I do not know why it should not receive the same treatment that other committees do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Before passing from the question of committee clerks I desire to make a statement. The amendments suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Connecticut were amendments in order, because they were reported from their respective committees and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The chairman of the Committee on Rules, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], mentioned to me before his departure (being necessarily absent for a week) that it was necessary that the clerk to the Committee on Rules should remain here during the vacation, that committee now having charge of the entire Senate wing; and he asked me to consider the question of inserting the clerk to that committee as an annual clerk. I did not say whether I would do so or not, though I called the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the situation. The committee concluded not to add to the number of annual clerks; but two such clerks having now been inserted, I ask unanimous consent, with no authority from the Committee on Appropriations to do so, to move to insert the clerk of the Committee on Rules after the amendments just agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 8, after the amendments already agreed to, insert the words:

Clerk to Committee on Rules.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of this bill to inform the Senate how much money in the whole is appropriated by the bill for the rent of buildings, rooms, apartments, etc., in this city, for in two or three of the instances that my eye has fallen upon I find that very large sums of money are appropriated for the rent of buildings in this District.

I remember that a few years ago there were considerable sums thus appropriated, and when the attention of the Senate was called to the matter the Senate imposed some very stringent limitations and regulations in regard to the renting of buildings, which I believe became laws, with the view of preventing the expansion of the renting business in this District, where we have so many public buildings, and where, if we have not enough for the economical and proper administration of the public business, we ought to build more rather than be paying rentals from year to year out of an abundant Treasury—abundant enough to build at a rate which, if private persons built their buildings as cheaply even as the United States do, would be an enormous profit upon the investment.

I see here that under the head of "the Post-Office Department" there are $17,000 appropriated for the rent of outside rooms and buildings to carry on three subheads or bureaus of the Post-Office Department: First, the money-order office; second, the money-order division of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department; third, for the rent of a building or room for post-office supplies, which I suppose means buying paper and blanks and such things which are furnished. Those three together amount to $17,000, which at 5 per cent. would represent a pretty large capital. Certainly those three offices could find a place in the public buildings already erected here. One would suppose that the Auditor of the Treasury might stay in the Treasury Department. If it is unsafe to put him with the man who attends to the practical money-order business of the Treasury, certainly the Treasury Department building just finished ought to supply a place.

But I did not rise to criticise mere individual instances. There are others. The sum total of it is that we are year by year spending very large sums of money for rents which make extremely profitable investments for—I will not say the favorites of the heads of Departments, but for those fortunate business men who are able to persuade a Secretary or somebody that their particular building is the best on the whole and the most convenient, and they get a rent for it that I think is usually once and a half what they could get from any private individual who had ever hired it before. That is perhaps natural to the public business, but I should be glad to understand, if I may, how it is that we go on year after year, with money enough to build the structures that are necessary, knowing what ought to be done, and do not do it, or if we have structures enough, why we have to spread ourselves out and colonize everywhere in hiring places for the various bureaus. Very likely the chairman of the committee can tell us all about it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have not made an exact footing of the amount of rent involved in this bill, but I should say in round numbers that it amounts to $4,800 for the Treasury Department, $9,700 for the War Department, $4,000 for the Navy Department, $22,260 for the Interior Department, $17,000 for the Post-Office Department, and $4,000 for the newly created Department of Labor, making altogether about $62,000 in round numbers. There is, in addition to that, paid for the Coast and Geodetic Survey Office $10,000 rent. There is also paid for the city post-office $5,000. The Committee on Appropriations have tried two or three times to secure the purchase of the building which is now used for the Coast and Geodetic Survey, in order to save that rent, but whenever we have inserted such a clause in an appropriation bill we have been compelled finally to surrender by the other House.

There is no doubt of the fact that every available space in this city owned by the Government is overcrowded with clerks. If the Senator will take observation of the report made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] from the special committee on the mode of conducting departmental business, at this session, he will find a statement there which discloses that there is not a single public building in the city of Washington that is not overcrowded by clerks. So the necessity for building additional structures must be apparent; but these various bureaus must be provided for until public buildings are erected, and therefore these rents are inserted in this bill.

As to the reasonableness of the rents, I think some of them are high, although they have been reduced gradually from year to year. We are now paying less rent for the same buildings than was paid at any time prior to this year. We have cut them down year by year in appropriation bills; but I think some of them are quite high now. Many of these buildings are inconvenient.

Some two years ago, I believe, we inserted in an appropriation bill a provision that the Indian Bureau, the Bureau of Labor, the Railroad Bureau, etc., should be transferred to the Pension Office building, and in this bill as it came to us from the House the rent for buildings for these several bureaus is only provided for until next December with a view of transferring three or four bureaus into the Pension Office building.

Following upon the heels of this bill the House of Representatives passed a provision in the sundry civil bill repealing the law of two years ago requiring these bureaus to be moved into the Pension building. To any one who examines the condition of the Pension Office it is perfectly apparent that such removal can not be made unless they use the great open space there, and that is provided to be used by the Post-Office Department in the sundry civil bill, which will come up later on.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator whether that Pension building was not examined at the instance of the Secretary of the Interior and pronounced to be unfitted to be occupied by the Indian Bureau?

Mr. ALLISON. It would not be unfit to be occupied if there was space there for it.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; that portion of the building to which the bureau was assigned, the fourth story, was pronounced by the commission as unfit for occupancy by the Indian Bureau.

Mr. ALLISON. Any one who will examine that fourth story will see that it can not be occupied by clerks. It is valuable for storage-room and is so used, but the entire building is now practically in use by the Pension Office, and it is proposed in the sundry civil bill to repeal all the provisions requiring other bureaus to be transferred there and to provide that the city post-office shall be put in that great corridor or central court.

Mr. BUTLER. Of the Pension Office?

Mr. ALLISON. Of the Pension Office; and the Secretary of the Interior has agreed to it by a letter which has been sent to the House committee, I understand. That is the situation of this matter in this city. I agree with the Senator from Vermont that some provision should be made for the construction of new public buildings.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will permit me I should like to add my testimony. It became my duty the other day to go into what is known as Marini's Hall, I believe, occupied by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury. It was on a hot summer day, it is true, but that place was so crowded by people as to be unfit to be occupied by human beings. I am told that there are eighty-odd people on one floor there. It is cruel to require people to subject themselves to hazard the loss of their health by being crowded as those people are in that building. I think it is the Sixth Auditor's office.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not only true, but a large force of the Sixth Auditor's clerks are in the third story of the Post-Office building, which has no ventilation from the roof, and which has little circular windows a foot or two square, and such a building as that is entirely unfit for occupancy by clerks in the hot months.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why do we go on year after year renting at apparently very heavy prices instead of building? I find that the sums named by the Senator from Iowa amount to $72,000 a year of rents. That is 10 per cent. on $720,000. Calling it 5 per cent.—it is twice that—which is a fair rate of interest now, the buildings represent $1,440,000 of capital that the United States might invest and get 5 per cent. on and save money on these rentals, save half the money that is now paid, and contribute to the comfort of the people employed; but we do not do it.

Mr. ALLISON. I can only answer the Senator's question by saying that the Committee on Appropriations have not latterly taken jurisdiction of the question of public buildings.

By a gradual process of exclusion, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have taken that question into their hands, even so far as not to allow the Committee on Appropriations to make revision of it. In other words, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have become a committee on appropriations as respects that particular subject, and therefore the Committee on Appropriations if it undertakes to suggest a public building in this city is regarded as usurping the functions of some other committee. Therefore, when, two or three years ago, we put on our appropriation bills provisions for public buildings, we were either turned out of doors by the House of Representatives or by the other committees of this body.

We agreed to an appropriation some years ago for what we regarded as a convenient fire-proof building well adapted to the public business in the construction of the Pension Office, and I think it has been ridiculed from that day to this on this floor.

That building, costing six or seven hundred thousand dollars, now is the best ventilated and the best constructed building for public use in this city, and it is a cheap public building. But it seems that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds find it necessary to erect here a building costing six or seven million dollars, consisting of corridors and walls and stairways as the State, War, and Navy Department building is, a building that has cost the Government $12,000,000, and yet it has scarcely the capacity for clerks or very little more capacity than the Pension building on Judiciary Square.

I believe with the Senator from Vermont that we ought this year to commence the erection of a public building in the neighborhood of the Post-Office Department, and that we ought to buy, if we can buy it at reasonable rates, or if we can not we ought to condemn the square between Eighth and Ninth streets and between E and F streets. Some years ago an enterprising citizen of this city built a cheap building there; I do not know how he came to build it, but the Post-Office Department straightway rented it at a rental of five or six thousand dollars; I do not remember the exact amount.

I think we ought to erect a building that can be used not only by the Post-Office Department and the Sixth Auditor's Office, but that can be used by these outlying bureaus of the Interior Department; and if need be part of the Post-Office Department could be temporarily put in the Pension building, although I am not satisfied that that is a wise thing to do; but certainly there ought to be a provision not only for the city post-office but for the overflow of the Post-Office Department, and of the Interior Department in that immediate neighborhood.

Now, we are paying rents, as the Senator from South Carolina says, for Marini's Hall, and the clerks are crowded in there at the rate of seventy or eighty or ninety in a small space. We have another building rented for the Topographer of the Post-Office Department, and so all about the Post-Office and Interior Departments are buildings rented by the Government. The Topographer of the Post-Office Department occupies a building for his bureau at a rental of $3,000 or $3,500 a year.

The inquiry suggested by the Senator from Vermont is a proper inquiry, and one which ought to address itself to the attention of this body. The Committee on Appropriations have tried at various times to release the Government from the neccessity of renting buildings, but have failed to do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I should like to suggest to the chairman of the committee to prepare and move an amendment to this bill, which will provide for buildings under the direction of some one of the Secretaries, or all of them—I do not care how—and for taking the land to do it, and ask the House of Representatives to agree to it, and then it will be done. We have this same kind of virtuous talk year after year, and find ourselves when the next bill comes around exactly where we stood before.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that I think the Committee on Appropriations do intend to propose on the sundry civil bill a provision for a building in this city.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend, on page 103, line 8, by striking out "$2,250" and inserting "$2,500," which is the compensation provided by law for the official there described.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the clause making appropriations for "dead letter office," on page 103, line 8, it is proposed to strike out "$2,250" and insert "$2,500;" so as to read:

For superintendent of dead letter office, $2,500.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that what the law now provides?

Mr. PLUMB. It is what the law now provides.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. The total of that item should be changed.

Mr. PLATT. The total should be changed also on page 104.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These totals will be changed.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to change the total of the paragraph so as to read "$119,580."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to go to page 7, line 22, and insert "twenty-four" instead of "twenty-seven" before the word "clerks."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the appropriations "for the Senate" on page 7, line 22, it is proposed to strike out "twenty-seven" before "clerks" and insert "twenty-four;" so as to read:

For twenty-four clerks to committees at $6 per day during the session.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. The total must be changed in line 24 to correspond.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Iowa that it would be better to have the footings changed by the organ of the committee. The clerks at the desk are hurried and can hardly find time to make the necessary changes.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course I have no objection to that suggestion. The clerk of the committee will see that the totals are correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The corrections will be furnished to the clerks at the desk before the close of the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I move to amend on page 64 by striking out lines 23, 24, and 25, and to the word "thereafter" in line 26. The clause relates to the appropriations "for legislative expenses of the twelfth biennial session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington." I move to strike out that part of the clause which is in the nature of legislation and is legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator allow the part proposed to be stricken out to be read?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 64, after the words "Territory of Washington," at the end of line 22, it is proposed to strike out:

Which session is authorized to meet on the second Monday of January, 1889, at 12 o'clock, noon, and each succeeding session shall meet biennially thereafter.

Mr. PLATT. It will be observed that I do not propose to strike out the appropriation, but the question has arisen whether the change of the time of holding the session is one which the Legislature could legally make, and that question has been referred to the Committee on Territories by a resolution, and is under consideration by that committee. Without expressing any opinion on it one way or the other now, it seems to me that the consideration of the question ought not to be forestalled by a ratifying act incorporated in an appropriation bill. I do not suppose that with these words stricken out it will make any difference about the holding of the session, but it simply relieves from the hasty legislation which is proposed in this appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut to strike out the words which have been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I submitted an amendment to the bill, increasing the salary of the surveyor-general of Oregon from $1,800 to $2,500, which was properly referred. It seems that it was not acted on by the Committee on Appropriations. I now present it to the Senate, and hope it will be adopted.

The surveyors-general of the Territories of Idaho, Montana, and New Mexico receive $2,500, the salary as fixed by law. The salary of the surveyor-general of Oregon is fixed by law at the same rate and he should have it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator indicate the page and line of the bill that he proposes to amend?

Mr. MITCHELL. On page 99, line 24, I move to strike out the words "one thousand eight hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two thousand five hundred."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon will be reported from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 99, line 24, it is proposed to strike out "one thousand eight hundred" and insert "two thousand five hundred;" so as to read:

For surveyor-general of Oregon, $2,500.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will explain that under an act recently passed additional work has been imposed on the surveyor-general of Oregon. There are several large Indian reservations in that State which are to be divided under that act, and the work of surveying these reservations is assigned to the surveyor-general. There are about 20,000,000 acres of unsurveyed lands in the State of Oregon. The surveyor-general of that State has certainly as much work under his supervision as any of the surveyors-general of the Territories adjacent, and his salary is fixed by law at $2,500, but is cut down by the Appropriations Committee. I hope it will be restored.

Mr. ALLISON. This is the salary that has been paid to the surveyor-general of Oregon for the last ten or twelve years.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg pardon. The Senator is mistaken. It is the salary that has been paid to the surveyor-general of Oregon for the last two years, but prior to that he was paid $2,500.

Mr. ALLISON. I may be mistaken, but if I am this is an exception. If we are to go back in this bill and insert everywhere the statutory salary it will require a revision of the entire bill. If there is any one thing that the Committee on Appropriations have been pressed about more than another it is for the increase of salaries in the Departments, indeed in every Department of this Government. There is not a day in the Interior Department, in the Navy Department, in the War Department, in the Treasury Department, or in any place that the present bureau officers and the Secretaries do not ask for an increase of compensation for the Democratic employés. If we are to begin with Oregon I do not know where we are to end. I care nothing about it; a salary of $1,800 may not be a sufficient compensation, but it is the salary allowed the surveyor-general in every State in the Union where we have such an officer. It is true that some of the Territorial surveyors-general receive a higher compensation, but——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The standing law, if the Senator will allow me, the old, regular, formal law put in the Revised Statutes, coming down from 1850, made a distinction between the Territories and the States of $500. For instance, the surveyor-general of Oregon by the Revised Statutes beginning with 1850 is to receive "at the rate of $2,500 a year." That was before Oregon was admitted, while she was a Territory. The surveyors-general of Colorado, New Mexico, Idaho, and the other Territories, naming them all, were to have $3,000 a year. So the distinction between the rate of the State surveyor-general and the Territorial one has always been kept up by a difference of $500.

Mr. BECK. It is to be observed, too, Mr. President, that in this bill the surveyors-general of the States, beginning with Minnesota, receive a salary of $1,800; the surveyor-general of Louisiana, $1,800; the surveyor-general of Nevada, $1,800; the surveyor-general of Oregon, $1,800; and the surveyor-general of each of the Territories receives $2,500.

Mr. MITCHELL. I admit that is so; but does not the Senator from Kentucky know that there is more work to be done in Oregon than in Louisiana or Nevada by the surveyor-general? In Oregon there is as much work being done now under the direction of the surveyor-general as in any one of the Territories.

Mr. BECK. I am not aware of the amount of the work done.

Mr. MITCHELL. There are 20,000,000 acres of unsurveyed land yet in Oregon. As a matter of simple justice, why not give this man a fair compensation? It is not a general application to have the statutory amount restored. I do not think there is any application from any other State. There is a particular reason for this increase, if you may call it an increase. The salary fixed by law is $2,500, but it has been reduced by appropriation bills to $1,800.

I shall not take up the time of the Senate about it, but I think it is a matter of simple justice.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator is mistaken as to Oregon, for I remember that in 1877 the rates of salary for governors of Territories and surveyors-general were overhauled in the House and finally agreed upon at the sums generally inserted in this bill. So it has remained ever since. It may be that the Senator is right in saying that Oregon was fixed by the general law at the rate he suggests.

Mr. DOLPH. The change was made, I think, two years ago—since I have been in the Senate; and at the last session or the session before an amendment offered by me was adopted in the Senate increasing the amount allowed for the surveyor-general in Oregon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 7——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is a further count demanded?

Mr. MITCHELL. A further count would perhaps develop the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No further count being demanded, the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In reporting this bill the committee inserted "For postage stamps for the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $100." That was done under the impression that the opinions of the Supreme Court could be sent to Senators under frank, but I believe those opinions are not regarded as public documents in the sense that would allow them to go free in the mails, and therefore it is necessary to increase the allowance for postage-stamps. I move, therefore, to add $50 in line 8, on page 8; so as to read:

For postage-stamps for the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $150.

That will necessitate changing the footing on line 10 of that page to $250.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, line 8, after the word "hundred," it is proposed to insert "and fifty;" so as to read:

For postage-stamps for the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $150.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now add $50 to the footing.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the same clause, in line 10, it is proposed to strike out "two hundred" and insert "two hundred and fifty;" so as to read:

In all, $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 3329) to regulate the subdivision of land within the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 7762) authorizing the restoration to the reform school of boys who have been discharged on probation, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 8308) to provide for the examination, and so forth, of certain manuscript volumes of the municipal laws of the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 10053) making May 30 a holiday in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 10060) prescribing the times for sales and for notice of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes; and

FOREIGN AFFAIRS FOR 1887.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, accompanied with selected correspondence relating to foreign affairs for the year 1887.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, June 26, 1888

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This communication is accompanied by a voluminous printed report. What disposition shall be made of the message and documents?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The ordinary number is printed as a matter of course, I believe, is it not? It should be, and the question of extra numbers should be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The document will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed.

WIDOW OF JOHN A. TURLEY—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 845 entitled "An act granting a pension to the widow of John A. Turley."

The husband of this beneficiary belonged to a Kentucky regiment of volunteers, and in 1863 having been in camp and on leave of absence he and others of the regiment embarked on a steam-boat in charge of a lieutenant to be taken to Louisville, whither they had been ordered.

While on the steam-boat an altercation arose between two of the soldiers, and the deceased interfered to prevent, as is alleged, an affray. By so doing he was pushed or struck by one of the parties quarreling and fell upon the deck of the boat, striking his head against a plank, thus receiving a fatal injury.

It is quite clear to me that the death of this soldier was not the result of his military service. His presence on the boat was in the line of duty, but he had no charge of the rest of the men and was in no degree responsible for them; and whether he should be in any way implicated in the dispute which occurred was a matter entirely within his own control and determined by his own volition. If he had refrained from interference he would have saved himself and performed to the utmost his military duty.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 26, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall this bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think, on the statement of the President himself, without going to the report of the committee, this man is entitled under the law to a pension. He was there in the line of his duty, and if it is not a part of the duty of a soldier, without waiting for the order of his captain if he is downstairs drinking champagne or asleep, to try to stop an affray between his fellow-soldiers, I do not know what the duty of a soldier is. I should like to see the Senate vote on this message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question? As the Constitution requires the vote to be taken by yeas and nays, the roll will be called.

Mr. BECK. Is it in order to refer the matter to the Committee on Pensions for investigation? It is evident that there is no quorum here, and perhaps we may have one by to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it stand; there is no use in referring it. I want to vote on the President's message itself, but as there is probably not a quorum, I move that the Senate adjourn pending this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message and bill will then lie upon the table and be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I want to leave the question as the unfinished business, just where it stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Senator from Vermont insists upon action on the question of the passage of the bill notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Pending that, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 27, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 26, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HEIRS OF CHRISTOPHER COTT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 956) for the relief of the heirs of Christopher Cott.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the Senate had better be read.

The amendment was read.

There being no objection, the amendment was concurred in.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT NATCHEZ.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1699) authorizing the Mississippi and Louisiana Bridge and Railroad Company of Natchez, Miss., to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at Natchez, Miss., with House amendment disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent that the House insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DAVIS, from June 27 to July 10, on account of important business.

To Mr. GRANGER indefinitely, on account of ill health.

SHOSHONE AND BANNOCK INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2266) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannock Indians for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation in the Territory of Idaho, for the purpose of a town site, and for the grant of a right of way through said reservation to the Utah Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. PEEL. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be now taken up and considered. A similar bill has been reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House; and it is very important that this agreement should be ratified promptly.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will have to object to anything that will lead to discussion, this day being set apart for the consideration of business from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, under the order of the House.

Mr. PEEL. I do not think that this will lead to any discussion.

Mr. FORD. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina to yield to me for a moment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Carolina demand the regular order?

Mr. DIBBLE. I feel compelled to do so.

The SPEAKER. This bill will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. FORD. I understand the gentleman from South Carolina will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the House will give me its attention, I would like to ask unanimous consent to make a change in the order of business for to-day. This day being set apart by order of the House for public buildings and grounds, I would suggest in view of the importance of the pending bill in relation to the public lands, that the special order be postponed, to take its place exactly as of to-day four weeks from this time, and to have precisely the same status as it now has on the Calendar.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would not agree to that. The only thing I would agree to is to make it a continuing order for one day, not to interfere with the revenue or appropriation bills.

Mr. SPRINGER. Very well.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that will be done.

HETTIE K. PAINTER.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report; a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send the report to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3839) granting a pension to Hettie K. Painter, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House concur in the amendment of the Senate to the said bill.

J. L. CHIPMAN,
CARLOS FRENCH,
E. N. MORRILL,
Managers on the part of the House.

A. S. PADDOCK,
C. K. DAVIS,
D. TURPIE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF HOUSE CONFEREES.

The Senate amendment to the House bill proposed to increase the amount named in the bill from twelve to twenty-five dollars. Several similar bills have passed for that amount. The services rendered by this lady were both as physician and nurse and entitle her to the highest pension allowed her grade.

J. LOGAN CHIPMAN,
CARLOS FRENCH,
E. N. MORRILL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The previous question was ordered.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CHIPMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the special order be made a continuing order, not to interfere with revenue bills nor appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that that motion will be agreed to, and that we may finish the land bill to-day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I add this to my request: with the understanding that it is not to be called up this week.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am perfectly satisfied with that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks unanimous consent that the special order for to-day be postponed and made a continuing order until one day has been occupied under it. Is there objection?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Allow me to make a statement. I know it is the purpose of Colonel MILLS, who is not in the House at this time, to proceed to-morrow, as he has given notice to gentlemen on the other side, with the revenue bill. Therefore I shall object to anything that interferes with the revenue bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. This does not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes; but I do not want any fight over the question.

Mr. DIBBLE. There will not be any fight over the question.

Mr. HOLMAN. There can not be.

Mr. MILLIKEN. This order is not to antagonize revenue bills and it is not proposed to do so.

Mr. MCMILLIN. With the understanding that it is not to interfere with revenue and appropriation bills, and with a view of getting the very important land measure through the House, I shall interpose no objection, provided only one day is to be used.

There was no objection, and it was accordingly so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to dispense with the call of committees; and in that connection I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to make from committees may have leave to present them to the Clerk for reference.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is now the consideration of reports.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that can be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not unfinished business have priority?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does not, until the time for the unfinished business of the House arrives.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the hour for the consideration of bills reported from committees may be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

AMENDMENTS TO LAND LAWS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7901) to secure to actual settlers the public lands adapted to agriculture, to protect the forests on the public domain, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the pending section.

Mr. VANDEVER. Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the bill, I desire to move a reconsideration of the amendment to section 20 that I offered last evening.

The SPEAKER. Was the amendment agreed to or rejected?

Mr. VANDEVER. It was rejected. It was the last business of the evening.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Strike out the proviso to section 20, as follows:

"Provided, That any actual settler on any tract of desert land entered under the provisions hereof may mortgage not exceeding one-half of his claim to procure the means necessary for the reclamation thereof as aforesaid, but that said mortgage shall be subject to the rights of the United States as reserved or defined in this act, or by other acts, and shall be dependent in all particulars, as far as the United States are concerned, upon the performance of the acts required to be performed by said settlers."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. VANDEVER] offered an amendment which was rejected. The question now is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VANDEVER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with that motion I desire to have read a communication addressed to the Secretary of the Interior by the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The communication was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 20, 1888.

SIR: I am in receipt, by your reference for a report in the matter, of a letter from Hon. WILLIAM VANDEVER, of the 16th ultimo, in which he asks to be informed of the status of the application pending in this Department for confirmation of assignments of desert land located in the Visalia land district of California, and whether any Congressional action is required or expected in regard to the desert-land act, to locations or assignments under it.

The act providing for the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories was approved March 3, 1877.

On the 12th of March, 1877, this office issued instructions (copy herewith) under said act showing the manner of proceeding to obtain title to desert lands.

On the 28th of September, 1877, this office, in pursuance of the directions of the honorable Secretary of this Department of September 12, 1877, suspended all entries made up to that date under the desert-land act at the Visalia land office, and issued instructions to the register and receiver of said office for a hearing to determine the character of the land embraced in said entries.

Under the directions of the Secretary of October 29, 1877, instructions additional to the above were issued by this office November 2, 1877, to the register and receiver to inquire particularly at the hearing whether the applicant knew from personal observation anything about the character of the tract entered before making the entry; if so, over how long a period his knowledge extended; whether he paid the first installment required by law to be made at the time of making said entry, or whether the money so paid was advanced by other parties; if so, by whom; whether he has assigned or mortgaged, or agreed to assign, convey, or mortgage his interest, present or future, in the tract or tracts so entered; if so, to whom, when, and upon what consideration; and where a conveyance, assignment, or mortgage, or an agreement to convey, assign, or mortgage the tracts entered had been made by the applicant, to require the original instructions, or a certified copy of the same, to be furnished and made a part of the testimony in each case.

A hearing was accordingly had, and, in pursuance of the Secretary's instructions in the matter, the Commissioner, on the 26th of October, 1878, forwarded to him the evidence submitted at the hearing, with his opinion that the entries ought not to be canceled.

On the question of the assignment of the claims, the Commissioner says:

"It seems that in this case money has been loaned by one of the parties (Haggin) to others, and a contract made which is set forth in the evidence purporting to give him a lien therefor on the land.

"In case the certificates are not assignable or the claims inalienable before a patent issues, then the contract for a lien on the land is simply void. I think that question is not properly before us in the case."

It will be observed that the record in this matter is now and has been before the Department since October, 1878, and I have the honor to state that I am not aware that an application for confirmation of assignments in these cases is pending before the Department, and that there is no evidence of record in this office that Congressional action is required or expected in relation to locations or assignments under the desert-land act. The letter herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

T. J. ANDERSON,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. W. F. VILAS,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. VANDEVER. Mr. Speaker, I introduce that communication from the General Land Office to show what has been the effect of a practice in the Land Office in the Interior Department of allowing assignments to desert-land locations. In the district I represent, according to that communication, under the act of March 3, 1877, desert-land locations from No. 1 up to three hundred and some odd were made. Assignments of them were made to a syndicate of persons, who now hold and control under those assignments some three or four hundred thousand acres of land in that district which they are holding from homestead settlement. The entries have never been perfected to this day, but the land is held up there, and the Commissioner in this communication says that he sees no reason for Congressional action at this time; meaning, I suppose, action to confirm these assignments. Now the bill under consideration proposes to depart from the policy which has been followed by the Government in regard to these desert lands heretofore, and to specifically confer upon the settler the power to assign and transfer one-half of his interest before he has perfected his title. The proposition is vicious in the extreme. The practice has been found to operate to the prejudice of the settler in that portion of the State of California which constitutes the very garden spot of that State, and this clause in the bill, if allowed to stand and become part of the law, will undoubtedly be construed by these parties as an indorsement by Congress of the right and propriety of allowing these homestead locators to assign their rights. The evidence in regard to those locations in that district is that there was connivance between the persons composing the syndicate and the men who made the settlements, and to this day we do not know who those men are nor where they have gone. The syndicate furnished the money to make the first payment of 25 cents an acre, and the land has been held by them down to the present time upon that payment of 25 cents an acre; the syndicate men control the water of that country, and, in addition to that, some three or four hundred thousand acres of land, thus constituting one of the most overshadowing and arrogant land-grabbing monopolies that can be found in the State of California or elsewhere. The passage of this clause of the pending bill will be in aid of their policy, and I ask the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands to consent, as a matter of precaution, to the adoption of my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California to reconsider the vote by which his amendment was rejected.

The motion to reconsider was rejected—ayes 10, noes 30.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. That any person who has not heretofore had the benefit of the homestead or pre-emption law, and who has failed from any cause to perfect title to a tract of land heretofore entered by him under either of said laws, may make a second homestead entry in lieu of the pre-emption privilege hereby repealed or the homestead entry lost.

The Clerk read also the following amendment, submitted by Mr. JACKSON:

Amend section 21 by adding, in line 3, after the word "cause," the following: "Except sale or disposal of his right thereto."

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, the principal objection that can be raised to the legislation contained in this bill is the tendency that it may have to enable parties to make a fraudulent use of the homestead law and the desert-land provisions of this act for the purpose of acquiring title to large bodies of public lands and withholding them from the use of actual settlers. The beneficent provisions of the homestead law, we can perhaps well agree, might be extended a second time to any settler who through misfortune or from other cause beyond his own control has not been able to perfect his title to the homestead upon which he first located. I would be entirely willing that there should be a provision in this general law allowing any such settler to make a second entry; but I think the condition upon which he should be allowed to make such second entry ought to be the loss of his first entry not through his own fault. With reference to the homestead law and desert-land acts I consider that a settler's loss by sale, whether by direct sale or by some agreement between the parties, is such a fault on the part of the settler that he ought not to have another opportunity to locate a homestead.

I know that there is a provision in the general law which prohibits the sale, assignment, or transfer of rights acquired under the homestead law, but all of us who have any acquaintance whatever with the practice under the law know that frequently this provision is avoided, and there is an arrangement by which a settler leaves his homestead for a money consideration and allows another to settle upon it and obtain the benefits of his improvements, thus doing indirectly what the law directly prohibits. Now, the object of my amendment is to provide that a man shall not have a second opportunity to locate a homestead where he has sold his first right. The homestead law is intended as a gift to an actual settler. No man should be permitted to make it a matter of speculation. Still less should inducements be given to parties to make repeated fraudulent settlements for the very purpose of selling and assigning their rights to speculators. This latter practice has become a very great evil.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON], and desire to be heard briefly on it and this section. My friend means well, but he lives too far from any vacant land to fully understand or thoroughly appreciate the practical operations of the land laws, and in his zeal to save the lands for settlers he would unwittingly do injustice to some of the most deserving of them.

He would make it impossible for some who have no home, and who have never acquired title to any land under the homestead law, to get public land.

This is neither the spirit nor letter of the original homestead act. It has, I think, been misconstrued against the interest of the settlers, and my friend accepts that bad construction as the real meaning of the law.

I think I understand something of the land law and know something of its workings in the public-land States, and I am satisfied that there can be nothing more just than this section. I have labored both in this and the last Congress to get this and the next section of the bill enacted into law. They were both favorably reported to the Forty-ninth Congress, but were never reached and were never considered. All the talk we have heard about settlers getting a second homestead under this section amounts to nothing whatever.

The homestead law provides that no lands entered under it shall be alienated or assigned in any way prior to the issuing of the final papers. All the relinquishment that can be made is one to the United States Government, and when made the land becomes a part of the public domain and is subject to entry by some other settler. No assignment to speculators is valid, but my friend may not know it. If no relinquishment is made and the law as to settlement and cultivation is not complied with, the entry is canceled and the land restored and opened to settlement.

So in either event the United States loses nothing, and if the settler who becomes dissatisfied with his surroundings and must move can find some other person who is qualified to enter and is willing to give him something for improvements, whose business is it but theirs? It is no concern to the Government since it still retains the title to the land. In the first draught of the homestead bill it was provided that no individual should "make more than one entry," and these words were stricken ont and the words "acquire title to more than one quarter-section" inserted, and that is still the law.

This ought to be sufficient to satisfy any one that Congress did not intend to restrict the settlers to one entry, but to limit the amount to be acquired under the law to one quarter-section. That is the plain, common-sense meaning of the language adopted. No one then dreamed that an uncompleted entry would estop the homeless settler from again taking up public lands. Many special acts have been passed by Congress for the relief of persons who have failed through misfortune or other causes to comply with the homestead law. Why not make a general law and treat all alike?

I am in full accord with the present Administration in its honest and manly fight to protect the public domain. I am opposed to all schemes of monopoly of the public lands by which the right of the people to obtain homes in a simple and easy manner is in the least restricted. All such laws retard the wealth and prosperity of our country. We can afford to be liberal with the tillers of the soil.

Millions of acres of the richest of our lands have been granted to railroads and other corporations, and yet we have been niggardly in our gifts to the settlers, who, with ax in hand, have gone upon the outskirts of civilization, away from society, churches, and schools, and made for us a civilization that challenges comparison with the old and elegant civilization of the East. In doing this these old pioneers have been kept in the front of the march of improvements, often moving before they acquired title; and now, when this civilization has reached the Pacific Ocean and must take up its permanent abode, shall we say to these honest old men, who must now cease their roamings, that though landless they can have no more land, because they did not remain on the first selection made? I hope not. There is no Western or Southern Representative here who knows that country and the hardships of such a life who would favor such a policy as the gentleman proposes. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I certainly am very strongly opposed to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There seems to be a very serious misapprehension on the part of some of our Eastern friends in relation to the development of the frontier of this country. They seem to think that all that is necessary is to go out there and break up the sod, plant crops, and immediately you are insured a bountiful return. This is absolutely not true. As a homesteader myself, having proved up upon a homestead after five years of residence there, having settled in a new county in Northwestern Kansas, I know something about the conditions of developing that country. I want to say to you that all through the western part of Kansas and Nebraska the ground before it has been broken and the country developed is no more capable of yielding agricultural productions than is the greatest desert in the world. The sod which covers that country is absolutely impervious to water. Dig down wherever you please from 3 to 4 inches, and you have to break the ground with a pick. But after the sod is broken up and the water is allowed to settle into the earth, the land seems to fertilize itself, and after three or five or seven years you can depend upon that ground for yielding agricultural productions. These are the facts. It takes from five to seven years and in many cases even ten years to reclaim the land there so as to make it possible to depend upon obtaining from it agricultural productions.

You have all heard of the droughty frontier. I have stated the reason for the conditions prevailing there. The state of things I describe has prevailed continually from the Missouri westward. There has been a constant development of the country by breaking up its entire sod.

Now, a great many persons who go upon the frontier are evidently men of limited means. They go out there and build their houses; they break up 20, 25, or 30 acres of that sod. At first it is absolutely incapable of production to any reasonable degree, and so it continues the next year. The settler finds that for perhaps the first time in his life he has been obliged to purchase everything at the store. The country is new; there is no soil for agricultural productions. The consequence is that he finds the money he carried with him is rapidly being exhausted, and, ordinarily, in five cases out of seven perhaps, unless he can obtain some employment, he is obliged to give up his claim and return to the East.

Every influx of immigration to that country breaks up more of the sod and consequently allows the ground thus broken to fertilize; so that the man who, after a lapse of four or five years, follows the one who has given up his claim, is enabled to take advantage of the work previously done and may thus possibly become an actual settler of the country and succeed in raising agricultural productions.

The first man who comes there and after trying to sustain himself for a year or two fails, being absolutely starved out of the country, forced back into the old settled sections for the purpose of securing employment for himself and support for his family, has virtually abandoned, you may say, his claim. The man who follows him learns perhaps of his address. It would cost from $15 to $20 to contest that claim through the land office. Consequently, whenever a man goes upon a piece of land which has been previously entered it is the constant practice for him to secure the assignment of the first man's original entry papers back to the Government, for which he receives the compensation of perhaps $15 or $20—just what it would cost to carry through the contest.

Now I want to say to you, and it is peculiar perhaps, but nevertheless it is true, that a man who goes upon the frontier and who from any cause is forced to leave the country and seek a home elsewhere, is never satisfied until he comes back. A few years after he has been there other men come and develop the lands and are growing agricultural productions. He comes back upon the frontier the second or third time to secure for himself a home. You can see the gross injustice, therefore, of this amendment. A man who has been already out upon the frontier, and has attempted to secure for himself a home, has been driven back by circumstances over which he had no control, perhaps, received possibly for his occupation of the land the compensation which is the universal custom of that country, of from $15 to $20 from the man who would have contested his claim. But he pays him this sum for the final receipt from the Government in order to avoid all contests, and the purchaser can go upon the land and complete his entry.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that debate on this proposition be now closed.

Mr. PEEL. I would like to have a few moments on this myself.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the amendment is one that will be voted down any way.

Mr. PEEL. I am opposed to the amendment altogether. I was not here, Mr. Speaker during the discussion upon this amendment, but I understand it is a motion to amend a section of the bill which allows persons who have failed to complete their title under the homestead law to take a second homestead.

I have always been of the opinion that the spirit of the law was to allow each citizen of the country not only to file his application for 160 acres of land, but to make his proof and obtain a complete title and a home for himself, and that there was nothing in the law to prevent that.

It is perfect nonsense to say that a man can not get a full title for a piece of the public land because some time or other in the past he undertook to make a claim which was not completed, or that some matter had interposed which prevented the completion of his title, and that he is therefore deprived of the benefit of the public domain entirely.

I have always believed that it was the spirit of the law, notwithstanding the rulings of the Department in the particular cases which have been submitted to it, that the homesteader should be entitled to a complete ownership of the public domain. That opinion has been sustained by the decision of a judge in some one of the Western Territories, which one I do not now remember, which settled the legal principle there beyond all question, where a party had made a homestead entry and was indicted for perjury under the following conditions: The evidence disclosed the fact that in some State he had filed an application under the homestead law and had failed for some reason to complete the title. He went West and filed an additional application on the ground that he never had the benefit of the act. Upon filing the second application he was indicted for perjury, but it was held by the court that he had not committed perjury, the spirit of the law being that he was entitled to the full completion of the title, and that he had not been in possession of the benefits arising under the act. He swore that he had not received the benefit of the act, and the court held that he had not received it by not having a complete title. I know many persons in my own State and section in the early days of the homestead law who in good faith made application and filed their application in the local land office, but some circumstances arose by which it became necessary that the party should change the location and thereby dispose of the little homes that they had already established and seek a home elsewhere. Surely it can not be contended that when a man sells his improvements only he gets anything from the Government. If he disposes of his homestead after improving it to some extent, he but sells the product of his own labor, and thereby does not deprive the Government of a single cent or in any manner interfere with its operations under the homestead law. He abandons the homestead for what he can get, and the purchaser gets the benefit of the improvements, but he has to go over the same course and make his final proofs as if he had been the original homesteader himself. The rights of the Government are all protected in such a transaction.

I think, therefore, in all fairness, that it is but just to the settlers of the country that they should have not only the benefit of the law for completing their homestead entry, but that they should have the perfect right to complete the title so that they may become independent citizens and property owners in their own right.

I hope the amendment will be voted down, and the settlers who have not completed their homestead entry will not have their little homes gobbled up by the land-grabbers who are seeking every opportunity to obtain possession.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected.

The Clerk read section 22 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 22. That any homestead settler who has entered less than 160 acres of land may enter other and additional land lying contiguous to the original entry, which shall not, with the lands first entered, exceed in the aggregate 160 acres; or, if such settler so elect, he or she may surrender the lands first entered to the United States for cancellation, and thereupon be allowed to enter lands under the homestead laws the same as if the surrendered entry had not been made, and the residence and cultivation of such settler upon and of the lands embraced in the first entry shall be considered residence and cultivation for the same length of time upon and of the land entered by the additional or new entry, and shall be deducted from the time of residence and cultivation required by law; and if such settler has made final proof and obtained title to less than 160 acres of land under the homestead law, and has, prior to the passage of this act, in good faith sold and conveyed the same, then he or she may enter so much of any other public lands as may be subject to entry as when added to the quantity previously acquired and sold shall not exceed 160 acres.

The amendment (by Mr. JACKSON) was read, as follows:

Amend section 22 by striking out the word "less," in line 22, and the word "than," in line 2, and adding "or less," in line 2, after the word "land."

Strike out all commencing with the word "may," in line 2, down to and including "she," in line 5; also strike out all of the remainder of the section after the word "made," in line 9.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that there must be some mistake in the first amendment. There is no line 22 of this section.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman evidently means line 1.

Mr. JACKSON. It should be printed line 1, of section 22.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a vote.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, this section is in line with the preceding one, subject to the same objections, and my amendment is for the same purpose as the one I offered to the former one; that is, to limit the gift of public land to a moderate-sized farm to actual settlers.

I can very well understand how gentlemen here representing districts containing public lands are urged by their constituents for legislation enabling them to obtain more and more of the public lands. They seem to act upon the principle that to him who hath much more should be given. Some of the arguments urged in favor of this section are, to say the least, very remarkable. It is urged that the public lands are poor, and almost if not altogether worthless; that it can be no great loss to give them away. There seems, however, to be a kind of sliding scale in the boundary line of worthless lands. Just as soon as the title passes out of the Government and into the hands of private persons the character of the lands improve. Of course I presume it is meant that cultivation improves the lands, but I fear that gentlemen in their anxiety to give their constituents greater facilities for obtaining title to them are possibly induced to state the matter a little stronger than they otherwise would.

The loyalty of the Western man to his particular locality is proverbial, and I suppose that nowhere else in all this country could you find a representative of these States and Territories willing to stand up and say, as has been said yesterday and to-day here upon this floor, that these lands are almost entirely worthless; that without more liberal legislation the limit of settlement has been reached; that it is necessary to give these lands away in order to have them reclaimed. I confess my surprise at these statements. Why, Mr. Speaker, large bodies of these lands are in States that we understood were the happy homes of free, industrious people, in great agricultural regions furnishing a large per cent. of the cereals of the country. Now they are described as barren, and we were told by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] that there will be no further settlement of all this vast domain; that the line has been reached. Gentlemen, I do not want to say anything unkind. I understand it is politic for you to make these remarks in order to obtain legislation. But there ought to be some legislation here keeping in view the fact that the public lands of the United States belong to the people of the United States and do not belong to the few who happen to live near them.

The whole argument here in favor of more liberal means of obtaining lands is upon the theory that the land is to be given to the people who are near the land. The United States has in its Eastern States and in the Middle States and in many portions of the old-settled country a large body of men who have no land at all. It is for them I speak. I want the public lands kept for the landless. I have a sincere sympathy for every family that owns no foot of land. And, Mr. Speaker, it is not so far back in our history and we ought not to forget that some of the States relinquished claims to the vast domain in the Northwest for the purpose of dedicating that domain to actual settlers. I feel that we ought to give credit in this matter where it fairly belongs. I consider that it is a proud monument to the early statesmen of Virginia that to settle disputes, and having in view the great future of our country and the prospect of formation of new States, they relinquished the claim of Virginia to that large body of lands in the north and west of that State that the General Government might control them and that they might be settled by freemen. These lands were relinquished to the General Government with the expectation that Congress would carefully and wisely dispose of them so as to promote the general welfare of all our citizens. The public domain is the property of all the people. The Louisiana purchase from France, the acquisition growing out of the Mexican war, and the Territory of Alaska have all been paid for out of the common Treasury and should be held in trust for the use of all the people. It is unjust as well as impolitic to dispose of these lands except in such a way as shall do justice to all our citizens.

I am opposed to the section under consideration for the reason that it is an unreasonable gift of lands and has the effect of nullifying an original provision in the homestead act that where a man located a homestead upon Government land adjoining sections which had been granted to railroads to aid in their construction he should only receive 80 acres. Why? The argument that was made on this floor in favor of granting alternate sections to railroads was that it was no loss to the country; that the remaining half of the land within the lines of the granting act would be worth to the Government and the people after the railroad was built just as much as the whole without the road. With this belief a modification was made in the homestead law, so that men could only take up half the quantity within the limits of these railroad grants. Many men, preferring these locations, accepted the smaller quantity in preference to twice the amount farther from railroads and obtained 80 acres along the constructed roads or near them. Having taken their choice, and compelled other citizens to go farther to secure homes, the proposition comes in this section that they shall have 80 acres more anywhere. This is a gift without reason or excuse. It is not in the line of encouraging our landless people to locate on the public domain.

Mr. MCRAE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. JACKSON. Certainly.

Mr. MCRAE. This section does not enlarge the land of people along the line of railroads. Their lands have been enlarged for five or six years. This section has no reference to such cases. If you have such a thought in your mind you may dismiss it. It has nothing to do with such cases.

Mr. JACKSON. I am yielding to the gentleman for a question and not for a speech. My time is very limited, and I have a great deal to say that I consider important. I only regret that I am not able to make my statements more interesting.

But, Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the gentleman only carry out what I said first, that all along of late years the effort of legislation has been to enable men to get more and more land. The gentleman calls attention to what ought to be known by all, that so far as the railroad legislation was concerned they had already obtained a chance to get much more land. I only used the railroad matter as an illustration, as the gentleman well knows that this bill will cover large bodies in similar grants as well as other lands. Besides, I still think that this bill will apply to many railroad grants. Every one knows that the only purpose of this section is to give men land who can not get it under existing law. There are many good features in this bill, and I regret to see it weighed down with such propositions as the section under consideration. The time has come to stop this kind of legislation, and I assure you that the country is now taking great interest in this matter. If you pass this bill without amendment, it will be understood to be a bill to enable men who have already been treated with great liberality in the gift of public lands to be treated with still greater liberality.

Let us show some disposition to save the public lands for the actual settlers who have no land, for the landless who want and need homes. Our policy ought to be to keep the land in small quantities. It is wrong policy and a wrong theory of legislation to encourage the ownership of lands in large bodies. The larger the number of people having an ownership in lands the better it will be for the nation.

Mr. MCRAE. It is evident from the answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON] made to my question when I interrupted him a moment ago that he has totally failed to understand the theory of the homestead law or the scope of this section. The main object of the homestead act of May 20, 1862, was to secure every citizen of the United States or person who has declared his intention to become such one quarter-section of land for a homestead. Those who own and reside upon farms of less quantity than 160 acres are allowed to enter other lands which would not, with the land already owned, exceed in the aggregate 160 acres. That provision was embodied in the homestead law and is still in this bill. It is right. No one, not even my friend from Pennsylvania, has offered to strike it out.

So we see, Mr. Speaker, that if a person qualified to make an entry does, by purchase, inheritance, or otherwise, acquire title to a less quantity than 160 acres, he or she may, under the law now, enter other and additional land not to exceed in all 160 acres as an adjoining farm entry. Why, then, should the same person be denied an additional entry because he has acquired his title to this less quantity from the Government under the homestead law?

Absurd as it may appear that is the construction and practice of the Department, and is, in effect, favored by my friend who offered the pending amendment. In some cases, such as within the limits of railroad grants referred to by my friend from Pennsylvania, the discriminations have been removed by special act. Let us now wipe them all out.

They all ought to be treated alike. The homestead law was passed during the late civil war and was not extended to the five public land States of the South then in rebellion, but by virtue of the first section of the act of June 21, 1866, its benefits were extended to those States with the settlers restricted to 80 acres for two years. The homeless emancipated slaves and other people were only allowed one-half the quantity allowed in the northern States, although the lands of the southern States were of less value. In this two years there were 11,629 entries made in those States, averaging 67.69 acres for each. There were 3,665 of these entries in my own State. Other settlers afterwards not so restricted, acting under the feeling and belief that they did not require as much as a quarter section, took less. As their families and necessities increased they have found that they should have more and now want it. I say, give it to them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friends will bear in mind that this is a principle of universal application. It is not designed to operate in one section of the country more than another.

Mr. McRAE. Certainly it is universal in its application; but the principle involved and justice proposed is forcibly demonstrated and shown by calling attention to this class of citizens who were thus wronged and who will be relieved by this act. There are many others in all sections of the Union. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment of Mr. JACKSON was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. That section 2291 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read:

"SEC. 2291. Each person making such entry shall, within three months thereafter, establish his or her actual personal residence in a house habitable at all seasons of the year upon the land applied for, and shall actually and continuously reside thereon until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry, and shall clear and place in cultivation at least 10 acres thereof within said period. And if at the expiration of such time, or at any time within two years thereafter, the person making such entry, or if he be dead his widow, or in case of her death his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry, her heir or devisee in case of her death, proves by two credible witnesses, who are householders, that he, she, or they have so continuously resided upon the same for the term of five years immediately succeeding the time of making the entry, and that he, she, or they have cleared and cultivated at least 10 acres of such land, and makes affidavit that no part of such land has been alienated, except as provided in this act, and that he, she, or they will bear true allegiance to the Government of the United States, then, in such cases, he, she, or they, if at that time citizens of the United States, shall be entitled to a patent as in other cases provided by law."

The Clerk read also the following amendment, proposed by Mr. LAIRD, to section 24:

Amend section 24 by adding, after the proviso offered by way of amendment thereto by Mr. DORSEY, these words:

"And no settler on the public domain, under the provisions of this act, shall be deprived of his title to any land based upon a receiver's final receipt, except upon an open and public trial under and according to the forms of law relating to contest cases."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the following amendment to section 24, proposed by Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin:

Amend section 24, in line 15, by inserting, after the word "householders," the words "residing within a radius of 10 miles."

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. I think it can be improved by inserting the word "neighboring" before the word "householders."

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it read "householders of the neighborhood." That is the more common expression.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. I will accept that suggestion.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the only serious trouble that could arise from the adoption of that amendment would be this: At times settlement has been made away out upon the prairies, and later the neighborhood has been abandoned by all except one settler, whom we will suppose to be the one who desires to make proof. Now, in order to make his proof he must have witnesses who know exactly the time he settled his claim, and who know his continuous residence there for five years; and it is within my personal knowledge that in many cases it has been found absolutely necessary to go or to send to some other section of the country in order to secure witnesses to make such proof.

Mr. MACDONALD. What substitute would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. I would leave it just as it is, because the rules of the Land Office which govern the register and receiver control all that.

Mr. MACDONALD. But this section speaks merely of "householders," and in any case the householder required as a witness might live in Maine.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. What difference does it make if the witness does live in Maine, provided he knows the facts?

Mr. BIGGS. And states the truth.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin, withdrew the printed amendment and offered as a substitute the following:

Amend section 24, in line 15, by inserting after the word "householders," the words "of the neighborhood."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following amendment to section 24, submitted by Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas:

Amend section 24 by striking out the word "five," in lines 7 and 17, and inserting the word "three."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the following amendment to section 24, submitted by Mr. DORSEY:

Add to section 24:

"It is further provided, That after proof is made before the register and receiver of the district in which the land is situated, and a certificate is issued to the entrymen, said certificate shall be considered prima facie evidence of ownership, and the burden of proof to vacate said entry shall rest upon the Government."

Amend section 24, in line 4, by striking out "three" and inserting "six."

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is so obviously proper that I think the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands will not interpose any objection to its adoption. This section of the bill proposes that the settler shall, within three months after making his entry, establish his residence in a house habitable at all seasons of the year upon the land applied for, etc. Now, I respectfully submit to the gentleman that it is absolutely impossible for the poor man to enter upon a tract of land and build his house so as to make it a habitable dwelling within a period of ninety days.

Mr. HOLMAN. I agree to that. Let us first take a vote upon the other part of the amendment, the proviso.

The proviso was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the second part of the amendment, which is to amend section 24 in line 4, by striking out "three" and inserting "six."

Mr. HERMANN. I move the adoption of that amendment.

Mr. GAY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "three" and inserting "nine."

Mr. HERMANN. Nine months is too long.

Mr. GAY. If six months is deemed a sufficient time, I will withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. DORSEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following amendment by Mr. PETERS to section 24:

Add to section 24 the following:

"Provided, That in all cases wherein a homestead entryman or pre-emption claimant, lawfully in possession of Government lands under acts of Congress which require residence, shall have been elected or appointed to any official position the acceptance of which requires his absence from said land in the discharge of his official duties, but who, nevertheless, shall have kept up his improvements on said land in good faith throughout such necessary absence, he shall be deemed to have complied with the laws relating to residence upon such land, and no advantage shall be taken of such necessary absence by any adverse claimant or by the United States, but such claimant shall be entitled to all rights and privileges which would attach to actual and continuous residence covering such period of necessary absence."

The amendment was rejected—ayes 7, noes 28.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 25. That section 2294 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read:

"SEC. 2294. In any case in which the applicant for the benefit of the homestead or desert-land law is prevented, by reason of distance, bodily infirmity, or other good cause, from personal attendance at the district land office, he or she may make the affidavit required by law, before any commissioner of the United States circuit court or the clerk of a court of record for the county in which the land is situated, and transmit the same, with the fee and commissions, to the register and receiver."

The following amendment (proposed by Mr. DORSEY) was read:

Amend section 25 by adding:

"It is further provided, That in all cases where notice by publication of intention to make final proof upon any land taken under the provisions of this act is required the entrymen shall be allowed ten days following the day named in the advertisement in which to complete proof and present witnesses."

The amendment was rejected.

The following amendment (also offered by Mr. DORSEY) was read:

Add as a new section after section 25 the following:

"SEC. —. That any person who may make a homestead entry upon any of the agricultural lands of the United States under the provisions of this act, and who shall erect a dwelling-house thereupon worth at least $300, and shall put into cultivation 20 acres of said land, shall, after one year's residence thereon, have the right to commute said entry under such rules as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and upon the payment of $1.25 per acre shall be entitled to receive a patent for said land."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. That the proof of settlement, residence, occupation, cultivation, irrigation, or reclamation, the affidavit of non-alienation, and the oath of allegiance required to be made under the homestead and desert-land laws, may be made before any commissioner of the United States circuit court, or before the judge or clerk of any court of record of the county or parish in which the lands are situated; and the proof, affidavit, and oath, when so made and duly subscribed, shall have the same force and effect as if made before the register and receiver, when transmitted to them, with the fee and commissions allowed and required by law; and the register and receiver shall be entitled to the same fees for examining and approving said testimony as are now allowed by law for taking the same. That if any witness making such proof, or any applicant making such affidavit or oath shall knowingly, willfully, and corruptly swear falsely to any material matter contained in said proofs, affidavits, or oaths, he shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and shall be liable to the same pains and penalty as if he had sworn falsely before the register.

SEC. 27. That it shall be unlawful to cut, cause, or to procure to be cut, or wantonly destroy, any timber growing on any lands of the United States, or to set fire to any tree or timber or underbrush on any timber lands of the United States and willfully or negligently leave the fire burning thereon, or remove or cause to be removed any timber from said public lands, or to knowingly manufacture any lumber from timber so cut or removed. And no owner, master, or consignee of any vessel, or owner, director, or agents, agent of any railroad shall knowingly transport the same, or any lumber manufactured therefrom, and any person violating the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined, for every such offense, a sum not exceeding $1,000: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall impair the right of any person who shall purchase timber on public land, under the provisions of this act, from cutting and removing the same, or prevent any miner or agriculturist from clearing his land in the ordinary working of his mining claim or preparing his farm for tillage, or from taking the timber necessary to make and support his improvements, or selling timber felled in the necessary clearing of the homestead, or the taking of timber for the use of the United States, and all moneys collected under this act shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States. But this section shall not be construed as repealing any provision of law touching or concerning the protection of timber on the public lands in any State or Territory of the United States, or as affecting in any wise penalties connected therewith.

Mr. HERBERT. I move to amend by striking out the last clause in the section just read. The language I propose to strike out is in these words:

But this section shall not be construed as repealing any provision of law touching or concerning the protection of timber on the public lands to any State or Territory of the United States, or as affecting in any wise penalties connected therewith.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, the result of this clause would be to nullify largely the very carefully drawn and properly considered provisions which precede it in the same section. A member of the committee who sits beside me tells me that the effect of striking out this clause would be to discontinue prosecutions which have already been commenced. Of course the purpose of my amendment is not to put a stop to any pending prosecutions, or to affect them in any manner; and it seems to me there can very readily be inserted a proviso that "nothing herein contained shall affect prosecutions now pending." I offer the amendment in that shape to strike out from the word "but" in line 24 to the end of the section and to insert in lieu thereof, "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall affect prosecutions now pending."

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will not press this amendment. There are two or three acts, passed several years ago (one in regard to the live-oak timber), the provisions of which, it seems to me, ought to be continued in force, otherwise the provisions incorporated in this bill should be broader than they are. I do not think it would be safe to adopt the provisions embraced in this bill without at the same time keeping in force the provisions of former laws. It can not possibly do any harm to continue those penalties; there can not be too many safeguards thrown around the timber lands of the United States. I hope my friend will not press his amendment.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman tell us the effect of the preceding part of the section if the latter clause, which I propose to strike out, be allowed to stand?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. The existing penalties would remain in force, and the provisions of this bill would be, as they are intended to be, cumulative. The whole system of laws on the subject would be perfectly consistent with each other. Our former laws have been the result of considerable experience, and we wish to retain them. The important feature, after all, of these amendatory provisions is that in regard to unlawfully permitting fires on the public lands.

That it shall be unlawful to cut, cause, or to procure to be cut, or wantonly destroy, any timber growing on any lands of the United States, or to set fire to any tree or timber or underbrush on any timber lands of the United States and willfully or negligently leave the fire burning thereon.

This provision is, in my opinion, the most important addition to the present law.

Mr. HERBERT. That would not be at all affected by my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. That may be; still, all these provisions are intended to be cumulative; and unless my friend from Alabama can point out some reason why the existing law should be repealed, I think the penalties now in force should be continued.

Mr. HERBERT. Under my amendment it is intended that this proviso in the bill shall become law:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall impair the right of any person who shall purchase timber on public land, under the provisions of this act, from cutting and removing the same, or prevent any miner or agriculturist from clearing his land in the ordinary working of his mining claim or preparing his farm for tillage, or from taking the timber necessary to make and support his improvements, or selling timber felled in the necessary clearing of the homestead, or the taking of timber for the use of the United States, and all moneys collected under this act shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think my friend falls into a misapprehension about this whole section in this respect. The provision which he has just read would more properly come in before the word "provided;" that would have been a better arrangement, although the sense is not changed a particle. The object of the proviso which the gentleman moves to strike out is to show that the penalties already existing were not intended to be repealed. That clause has no special relation to the provision which the gentleman has just read, following the words "provided, however."

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman does not mean to say if you pass the law leaving out those words—the words in the proviso—will not have the same effect.

Mr. HOLMAN. They have now?

Mr. HERBERT. Let me state my point. I know different courts at different times construe differently the rights of a settler to cut and carry away timber where he is making a clearing. Some courts hold it to be a violation of law under the circumstances enumerated here, and at other times—and properly, I think—they hold otherwise.

I think this would be a proper enactment. The provision is carefully drawn generally, but I do not think any settler should be held responsible, as he now is, for selling the timber he cuts in clearing up a homestead. I think that should become law. I do not see any good reason for making a provision of that kind and afterwards annulling it by saying that this shall not be construed as repealing any provision of law touching or concerning the protection of timber on the public lands in any State or Territory of the United States or as affecting in any wise penalties connected therewith.

Mr. HOLMAN. This statement of my friend shows me that he misapprehends this section. This provision has been studied with care and adopted after a thorough examination of the existing laws and penalties. The trouble with the gentleman is this—here is where it comes in properly——

Mr. HERBERT. I will read how I consider it ought to be.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me finish my statement. If you will turn to page 18 you will find it is provided—

That no owner, master, or consignee of any vessel—

I wish to state right here that this legislation had reference originally to the exportation of timber cut from live-oak forests of the South, and hence the necessity of this provision—

And no owner, master, or consignee of any vessel, or owner, director, or agents, agent of any railroad, shall knowingly transport the same, or any lumber manufactured therefrom, and any person violating the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined, for every such offense, a sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. HERBERT. Right there——

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me proceed. Now, right there we might transpose, commencing with the word "but," in the last sentence of the section, so as to insert it before the word "provided" and after the words "one thousand dollars." Then immediately after "not exceeding one thousand dollars" insert:

But this section shall not be construed as repealing any provision of law touching or concerning the protection of timber on the public lands in any State or Territory of the United States, or as affecting in any wise penalties connected therewith.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I can make the proposition somewhat clear.

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not think the gentleman understands it.

Mr. HERBERT. I have the floor. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen of the committee are perfectly willing this proviso shall be adopted. I do not understand any gentleman has opposed my amendment, or is unwilling the words of the proviso I have read shall be omitted. So I suggest, instead of the amendment as sent up, these words be inserted in line 25; so it will read:

This section, except as to the proviso, shall not be construed as repealing any provision of law touching or concerning the protection of timber on the public land in any State or Territory of the United States, or as affecting in any wise penalties connected therewith.

That will have this effect. This is simply cumulative. Passing it does not affect any laws on the statute-book in reference to the protection of timber, and I am perfectly willing the proviso shall become law if those words are inserted.

Mr. HOLMAN. The section is right as it is. That is the fact about it. It has been most carefully studied. If the gentleman prefers those words inserted I am willing to transpose it in that way, although I do not like to do it.

Mr. MACDONALD. I think I can make it clear that the gentleman from Alabama is laboring under a misapprehension. Gentlemen will bear in mind it is a fundamental principle wherein a new law is enacted fixing penalties for crime unless there be a saving clause it operates to exempt parties committing offenses previously. This provision of law is intended to prevent making it a crime for parties to start a fire in certain forests, leaving it remain, "except in certain cases." It was determined by the committee for greater protection, they intended to prevent other parties from escaping who should come in there. But in this section it is provided—

That it shall not be construed as repealing any provision of law touching or concerning the protection of timber on the public lands in any State or Territory of the United States, or as affecting in any wise penalties connected therewith.

Mr. HERBERT. As I understand it, the gentleman is willing to transpose that last sentence of the section so it shall come in before the word "provided."

Mr. HOLMAN. I am willing to make that transposition.

Mr. HERBERT. My proposition is to transpose the sentence beginning with the words in the twenty-fourth line "but this section shall not be construed as repealing any provision of law," etc., and continuing down to the end of line 28, to transpose the entire paragraph to the fourteenth line, so that it will come in after the word "dollars" in that line.

That is where it properly belongs, in my opinion.

Now, I understand the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, consents to that transposition, and it will effect the object I have in view. He sees no objection to it. I do not believe any other member of the committee except the gentleman from Minnesota objects to it. I therefore ask a vote upon the transposition.

Mr. HERMANN. Your original amendment was sufficient.

Mr. HERBERT. Yes; but I put this in lieu of the other in order to put myself in harmony with the majority of the committee. I believe the whole committee, excepting the gentleman from Minnesota, are willing to accept it.

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not so understand it. This is the first time that I ever heard of a sentence qualifying a section of a bill put in the middle of the section. It is always placed at the end of it, just where this is, and properly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I said to my friend from Alabama rather than have the time consumed I would consent to the transposition, but I am satisfied the more he will consider the section the more convinced he will become that it is now in its proper position; and I hope he will not insist upon the amendment.

Mr. HERBERT. I am so much impressed with the necessity of making the change that I offer the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to insert the words which I think will make this perfectly clear.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the twenty-seventh line, after the words "United States," insert "not in conflict with it."

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will let the section stand just as it is.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Arkansas would come in more properly after the word "law," in the twenty-fifth line, and I offer it there; so that this section will read:

But this section shall not be construed as repealing any provision of law not in conflict with it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after the last word in section 27, as follows:

"Provided always, That it shall be lawful for any settler on any subdivision of lands in the United States to remove, use, or sell any dead or fallen timber found thereon."

Mr. HOLMAN. I think he has that right now as it is.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I will say to the learned chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands that if he will look at this very bill itself he will find that it is prohibited by this very section. For instance:

SEC. 27. That it shall be unlawful to cut, cause or to procure to be cut, or wantonly destroy any timber growing on any lands of the United States, or to set fire to any tree or timber or underbrush on any timber lands of the United States and willfully or negligently leave the fire burning thereon, or remove or cause to be removed any timber from said public lands, or to knowingly manufacture any lumber from timber so cut or removed.

I call the gentleman's attention to the words:

To remove or cause to be removed any timber from said public lands.

It is not only for the interest of the person who resides upon the land that he shall have the benefit of such dead timber, but it is for the benefit of the lands themselves to remove the dead or fallen timber.

Mr. WEAVER. I think the gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. HOLMAN. As to the location of the proposed amendment, it will be noticed that I am trying to avoid, as shown by my colloquy with my friend from Alabama, any conflict between the two provisions of this section. The last clause of it refers to the provision embodied in the first clause, and it was an important matter which should be made clear and distinct. It seems to me that this amendment should come in after the word "United States" in this connection:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall impair the right of any person who shall purchase timber on public land, under the provisions of this act, from cutting and removing the same, or prevent any miner or agriculturist from clearing his land in the ordinary working of his mining claim or preparing his farm for tillage, or from taking the timber necessary to make and support his improvements, or selling timber felled in the necessary clearing of the homestead, or the taking of timber for the use of the United States; and all moneys collected under this act shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

And right there after the word "United States" that language ought to come in.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. It does not make a particular difference where it comes in in the paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will otherwise divide the section into three parts instead of two.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I have no objection to inserting it in line 24, after the words "United States," as suggested by the gentleman.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 27 add:

"Provided, however, That timber not of commercial value, as sawed or hewed timber, growing on public lands wholly unfit for cultivation shall be free for the domestic use of any bona fide resident of the Territory in which said timber on such land is found."

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand where it is proposed to insert this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the end of the section?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that will not be done. This section is regarded as one of the most important sections in the bill, and if so amended it will be confused to an extent to make its interpretation almost impossible. That provision ought to come in as an independent proposition, if at all.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. It is already in the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. There was an amendment offered that was identical with this.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. This amendment applies to a different class of land.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. That provision is already in the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. But it applies to a different class of land.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is in almost the same words.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. If it will cover this section too, well and good.

Mr. HOLMAN. The language is almost identical.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman insists upon his amendment. The Chair will put the question.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I believe we are still on section 27, are we not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. COBB. I move to strike out the last word in order to call attention to what I conceive to be a serious defect in this section, and to which I invite the attention of the chairman of the committee. Section 27 contains a penal statute. At the close of the section are these words:

That this section shall not be construed as repealing any provision of law touching or concerning the protection of timber.

That is to say you enact a penal statute, and as a part of the statute itself you say it shall not affect any existing law. Now, suppose there be a penal law in existence in conflict with this section. How would the courts construe it? There are penal enactments now in existence touching the protection of the timber in the United States. Here is another law making it a penalty to do certain things upon the public land of the United States. In this last section you incorporate the provision that none of the existing laws shall be affected by this section at all. If it should happen that any of the existing statutes are in conflict with this section, you have a serious situation about which the courts of the country would have difficulty in their construction.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can my friend say there is any provision of law that will come in conflict with the penal provision?

Mr. COBB. I asked that question of one of the members of your committee, and he told me he did not know whether there was or was not. I do not know.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is not a subject in regard to which any member would study all the statutes for the purpose of enabling him to draw up a section.

Mr. COBB. I ask the chairman of the committee whether he can or can not tell us whether there is any law now in existence in conflict with the section as it is framed?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say that I drew up this section with all the penal statutes on the subject before me. I incorporated this section simply out of abundant caution; nothing more.

Mr. COBB. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly evident if there is any law now in existence in conflict with this section it is intended that this section shall repeal it, otherwise it would be useless legislation altogether, or very singular legislation. If you have an act in conflict with existing law and say at the same time that both shall stand, you have a system of legislation singular indeed and leading to serious complications. Now, I take it for granted that it was the intention of the committee to have all laws which are in conflict with this section repealed by it. If so, this latter clause ought to have inserted in it the words which I proposed just now as an amendment. Those words are:

But this section shall not be construed as repealing any provision of law not in conflict herewith.

That makes it plain. There can be no difficulty in construing the existing law with this law so as to prevent difficulty. I ask unanimous consent to renew this amendment and have a vote upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can offer the amendment without asking unanimous consent. The Chair understands the gentleman withdraws his formal amendment and offers this.

Mr. COBB. Yes; I withdraw my formal amendment and offer this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "law," in line 26, insert:
"Not in conflict herewith."

Mr. COBB. That will prevent the difficulty I have suggested.

Mr. MACDONALD. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. COBB. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD. I suggest that you say "with it" instead of "herewith."

Mr. COBB. I have no objection. I do not care, if gentlemen like that better.

The amendment thus modified was reported by the Clerk.

The question was put on the amendment, and the Chair was in doubt as to the result.

Mr. COBB. I call for a division.

The House divided; and thereupon there were—ayes 13, noes 17.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Insert the word "agent" after the word "director," in section 27, line 9, and strike out the word at the end of the line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. That a strip of land of the width of 2 rods on each side of the section lines on the public lands shall be, and is hereby, dedicated for public highways, and may be opened or vacated in the manner provided for establishing public roads by the State or Territorial Legislatures, and until opened, or if opened and afterward vacated, shall be considered a part of said sections respectively, and shall pass to and vest in the owners of said sections, subject only to said right of highway as aforesaid.

Mr. JACKSON. The purpose of my amendment is to change, and, as I think, improve the phraseology of the section, and I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee to the amendment. I understood in the committee that it was thought there should be some change in the phraseology of this section.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment be read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] prepared that section of the bill, and I would like to hear what his view is upon the proposed amendment.

Mr. MCKENNA. I do not consider it an improvement.

Mr. JACKSON. You leave the title to this strip in uncertainty.

Mr. MCKENNA. I think not. While I suggested the substance of that section, the language is the language of the committee, and I think it expresses what they desired to express, and ought not to be amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to understand this clause in the text, beginning in the third line: "May be opened or vacated in the manner provided for establishing public roads by the State or Territorial Legislatures until opened, or if opened and afterwards vacated," etc.

It seems to me that that clause as it stands provides only for the opening of this part of each section, namely, two rods wide on each side of the section line, at the instance of the Territorial or State Legislature, or in pursuance of laws passed by such Legislature; whereas I think the clause should provide that the land should be forever reserved as a public highway, unless vacated under and in pursuance of laws passed by the Legislature.

Mr. PAYSON. That is precisely what the section as it is now provides.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand it just the other way.

Mr. PAYSON. If the gentleman will give me his attention for a minute I think I can convince him. The section provides that "a strip of land of the width of two rods on each side of the section lines on the public lands shall be, and is hereby, dedicated for public highways." There is the fundamental proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. If you stopped there it would be all right.

Mr. PAYSON. We do not stop there, and we ought not to stop there. The title is now in the Government, and we go on to provide by this section that the lands so dedicated for public highways may be opened or vacated in the manner provided for establishing public roads by the State or Territorial Legislatures.

That makes it perfect as to them, and there is no difference in the principle between the section as it is now and the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON], except that the language that he uses is less clear and distinct than this, and is, I submit, no improvement. We first dedicate the land for public purposes and establish public highways, and then provide that the Territorial Legislature may adopt the machinery required for the perfecting of the grant that we make. The language of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON], on the other hand, only provides that the Territorial Legislature may improve and work the grant. That is a matter of their own concern, in regard to which they may do as they see fit. That ought to be a matter purely of local legislation. All that we do is to provide by dedication for public highways, and then we throw upon the Territorial or State Legislature the duty of opening them as the public necessities may require.

Mr. SPRINGER. What I object to is this provision:

And until opened shall be considered as part of said sections respectively, and shall pass to and vest in the owners of said sections subject only to said right of highway as aforesaid.

Mr. PAYSON. That is just what we want to do. We provide that the owner may use the land until it is opened, but that when opened the public comes in and have the right of user.

If, in the language of the section, the highway should at any time afterward be vacated, then the title would revert to the owner of the section as it should do; otherwise, as the Government now owns the title and dedicates the land for the purpose of a public highway, the title, if there should afterward be a vacation of that highway, would revert to the General Government; so that an additional conveyance of the title from the General Government to the owner of the section would be necessary. This seems to me a very simple proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. But suppose the homesteader should take the section before any act of the Legislature had been passed or put in force for opening the highway; he would then take absolutely——

Mr. PAYSON. No, sir; under the provisions of the bill he takes the land subject to the dedication for the public highway, this dedication to be perfected by the Territorial Legislature whenever the necessities of the case may require.

Mr. SPRINGER. But suppose he should take the land before the Legislature had opened the highway, and should build an important improvement on the section line——

Mr. PAYSON. That would be his misfortune.

Mr. SPRINGER. And suppose afterward the Legislature should open the highway; then, it seems to me, under the provisions of this section, he could claim damages——

Mr. PAYSON. Does not my colleague see that the very first provision of this section is that "a strip of land of the width of 2 rods on each side of the section lines on the public lands shall be and is hereby dedicated for public highways?" This dedication being made by an act of Congress, the Government owning the land, whoever may succeed to the land takes it subject to that easement. This is as familiar a proposition in real-estate law as the proposition in mathematics that 2 and 2 make 4. The land being subject to this easement, if any one builds improvements upon the land thus dedicated it is his misfortune; but the public convenience must not be defeated, simply because some one may make a mistake in building his house on land which has been reserved.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would prefer that the section should read as follows:

That a strip of land of the width of 2 rods on each side of the section lines on the public lands shall be, and is hereby, dedicated for public highways and shall be held by the person owning the section, subject to this right of way.

Mr. PAYSON. That is exactly what this section does now. I submit to my colleague (he and I wanting to accomplish the same thing) that it would perhaps be somewhat difficult for him, under the inspiration of the moment, to suggest a section which would be more apt in its phraseology than this which has received the careful consideration of the Committee on Public Lands for a couple of days.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think it would be better if the language were similar to that I have suggested. Still I am willing to take the section as it is, and will not offer any amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no direct interest in this matter; and as other gentlemen seem satisfied with the language of this section I will not press any objection. I am, however, very well satisfied that the section as now written is not correct and will not accomplish what gentlemen expect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. JACKSON. No, sir. Under this section, after the road is once opened according to the local law, the title would be left in abeyance; no one would know where it would be. More than that, if the road, having been once opened, should be vacated, then all right to open other roads, no matter how much they might be needed, would be gone. Thus the section would become inoperative and of no use. I think it might have been worded so as to be of great service—to lay on the lands an easement which would have been a great convenience and no further burden than as an easement.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. MCADOO. I propose a new section, which I will read.

Mr. WEAVER. I want to offer an amendment to section 28, and the gentleman from New Jersey proposes a new section which is not in order until we have first perfected the pending section 28.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized, after which the gentleman from New Jersey will be recognized to offer his amendment.

Mr. WEAVER. I move the amendment which I send up to the Clerk's desk, to come in immediately after the provision providing for laying off roads.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. And along all water-courses and on each side thereof immediately adjoining low-water mark there shall be reserved to the United States for public use alternate strips of land, 100 feet wide and 1,000 feet long, lying parallel to said streams and following the meander thereof. Like reservations shall be made along all lake and sea shores where they adjoin the public lands of the United States. All patents for lands disposed of after the passage of this act shall expressly recite this reservation.

Mr. WEAVER. I should like to have the attention of the committee for a short time while I explain the necessity for this amendment. I regard it as an important one. It was offered last evening, but passed over by consent. It should be inserted as part of section 28, where reservation for highways is made. That provides for highways in getting to water and returning therefrom. It is an important provision, and there should be the further provision which is contained in my amendment to make it complete, so that when they go over the highway they may have access freely to the water.

Mr. HERBERT. Let the amendment be again reported.

Mr. WEAVER. Certainly, as it is my desire that the amendment shall be perfectly understood.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HERBERT. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. If gentlemen will think for a moment they will see its consequences are far-reaching. If along all the public streams flowing through the public lands of the United States there shall be these reservations it would constitute a very large portion of the public domain. Timber scattered along the streams would furnish a constant temptation to depredators. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the United States ought not to reserve any public lands anywhere in small quantities. The policy of doing so, it seems to me, would be a bad one. In many sections we have trouble growing out of the fact that there are numerous suits brought against persons where the United States is charged with depredating upon the timber lands. In the first place, it would be difficult to find them out in the case of these reservations. There would have to be a survey of every one of them. The lands would have to be marked so distinctly that every person should be warned that if they attempted to go beyond the fixed line and cut timber they would be trespassers under this very act, and punishable by a fine of $1,000 and by imprisonment also.

It seems to me the Government ought not to have any land reserved anywhere. Certainly it ought not to have reservations of lands which would be a constant temptation to evil men, and a constant source of trouble to honest men. What is the use of it? What is its purpose?

Mr. WEAVER. There can not be any difficulty about it, and certainly there can be no inconvenience. The Government owns it and dedicates it to the public use forever. It is to prevent mischief. Every one on the frontier knows parties of settlers take up the water-front on a stream, perhaps the only stream in the surrounding country. Twenty or thirty men may enter the whole front of a stream, and on the side of it. They will thereby cut off all others from access to that water. They may cut off their water along the stream for many miles in either direction. Now, that is a great hardship. But such is often the situation in the West. There can be no harm, therefore, in making a reservation of this land. As we have provided for highways, for ingress to the water and egress therefrom, we ought to provide these reservations so the settlers may obtain the water after they get to the stream. They can thus obtain water for their stock without having a man with a revolver standing across the highway and backed up by cow-boys to drive them off. No injury can arise from carrying out this amendment I have proposed, but, on the contrary, it is for the purpose of benefiting the settlers on the public lands.

Mr. MCADOO was recognized.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the more you think of this the more the difficulties multiply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Alabama desires to address himself to the amendment, the Chair will recognize him later on.

Mr. MCADOO. I think this is one of the most important amendments to the bill. Some two or three years ago it was my good fortune to pass over the Northern Pacific Railroad, and while so doing I had a conversation with one of the largest capitalists of New York City, as well as the owner of the greatest cattle herd in that whole Western region.

I studied the question while in that country as best I could and the position of the case as far as the disposal of the public land was concerned. From personal observation I became convinced that the man who owned the water owned the land virtually. The Western country, that portion that needs irrigation, presents this condition of things: That the man who controls the right to a living stream of water is virtually the lord of the territory as far back as he chooses to go; and in a cattle country where the cattle were dying for want of water, and he commanded the right of way to it, he was virtually the owner of the surrounding land.

I stated that in my opinion the United States ought, under the right of eminent domain, if in no other way, to condemn the right of way for the smallest cattle-owner to take his herd of cattle to the living stream of water; and this gentleman admitted that in his opinion that was the solution of the whole problem—getting the small cattle herds in such a position that they might afford to live, as against the tremendous companies that control the cattle trade of that region.

Mr. Speaker, I can not imagine a more important amendment for the great Western country than the one offered by the gentleman from Iowa, and that of the gentleman from Wisconsin, now pending.

If you want to make it possible for the poor man to graze his cattle on those lands at all, and obtain the use of the land for that purpose, you have got to give him the right of way through or over the public highway to the living stream of water in that country. Why, take an illustration: Here is a little river or a little spring and a powerful company, or a rich man goes out there and the first thing it or he does is to secure the land immediately bordering upon this water. There may be no water nearer to that point than 40, 50, or 100 miles, and every living creature, man and beast, is absolutely at the mercy of the individual who owns the land around this stream of water. Now, I say that it is a bad policy for the United States Government to give up an acre of these lands around a living stream of water in a country that is rainless for six, seven, or nine months of the year. We are deluding the people of the East when we ask them to go out and take up these lands which have no water upon them, and upon which there is no rainfall for nine months of the year.

It is an injustice to a man to give up his home in the East and ask him to go out there and take up a homestead, only to find that condition of things prevailing, to find that there is no water, that his neighbor across the way owns the river, or the creek, or the lake, or the spring, or that it belongs to the tremendous cattle syndicates, and who hold it with such a tight grip in the hands of these powerful monopolies that a thirsty dog traversing the prairie dare not stop to lap the flowing water to slake his thirst without paying tribute if he could to the powerful combination. The water should be as free as the air we breathe. It was but a few years ago, as you all remember, that a riot was almost precipitated out in that region by the fencing in of the springs of water by some of the cattle syndicates. Valuable herds of cattle were staggering around on the prairies absolutely dying from thirst.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. MCADOO.

Mr. MCADOO. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very important measure now before the House. I do not know of a more important bill in this Congress than the bill reported by the Committee on the Public Lands now pending before us; and I think that the masses of the people in this country will consider it when it is passed as one of the most important bills ever enacted in any Congress.

But, sir, I want, when it is perfected, that this vital thing of water shall be preserved to the people of this country. We have land monopolies here now which are controlling principalities in extent. We have land and industrial monopolies, but still at least we have as yet no water monopoly. But it was only recently in one of our oldest States that a powerful syndicate started out for the purpose of controlling the watersheds which supply the great cities, and if this condition of things goes on long enough, we will have not alone monopolies of lands, but we will have water monopolies, and the time may come, if science shall furnish the invention, when we will have a monopoly of the air we breathe, and will not be permitted to use it without paying tribute to somebody.

Confederation, combination, and conspiracy, inspired by greed and corporate and individual rapacity, threaten the welfare and very existence of our people. Let us check and avert them here and now.

Now, sir, this amendment is eminently practicable. Wherever there yet remains an acre of the public domain near living water, save it—save it for the people who are going to settle upon the surrounding territory. Save it as a common highway by which the poor man may drive his steer to water, or where his family may go to get water necessary for their existence, and not let it be stolen by the "dummy" entryman, by the first man on the ground, by the pioneer capitalist, who foresaw that if he once got possession of the water he would get the land, and having gotten the lands around the water has shut off all other people. I say it is time for the United States to step in and protect what we have remaining, ay, far more important as a duty than the preservation of the great national pleasure park for English lords and dukes and our privileged and indolent classes to hunt stags and deer in. Preserve these lands in the immediate vicinity of the water, without which your public domain is but a snare and a delusion to tempt the honest settler who goes into the West to build up your country in good faith.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this will not cost a great deal of money, because wherever condemnation is necessary under an honest Secretary of the Interior, or an honest valuation, valuing the land for what it is worth as land, not allowing the right to add to the value of the land what has been obtained by trick and chicanery, to wit, the absorption and monopoly of the water, you will be able for a comparatively small sum to thus preserve to your people a priceless heritage; and the Congress which ingrafts this resolution in the bill will be held in grateful remembrance by every honest man on the public domain and by every good citizen in the United States. Water, and air, and land are God's great gifts to our race, and while private property is always to be respected, let us in this great continent of freemen stifle and crush out in its inception all monopolies in these essentials to existence.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. I desire to address the House in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER]. We have reserved in this bill a 4-rod roadway between the alternate sections or the section lines. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa proposes to give us a body of land 100 feet wide and a thousand feet long along the streams, lakes, and seashore. To my mind that seems to be a very wise provision. The settlers back from these streams, lakes, and so forth, if they wish to get water, can combine and put up pumping works and lead the water on their lands by means of piping. They can thereby inaugurate a system of irrigation cheaply. I know of no other way of succeeding in irrigating some of these lands, if the Government does not enter into it, than by the combination of settlers; and in order to give them a chance to get to the water we should reserve some land for that purpose. Four rods of width is not enough to put up pumping works and permit stock, and so forth, to be driven to these waters. We should not occupy the highway for this purpose. We should put the pumping works alongside of the water. I believe the amendment is well put and should be adopted.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, if this question related simply to land in the West which had to be irrigated for purposes of cultivation or to those portions of the country where water is very scarce, there might be something in this objection; and there is now, but this is not the proper mode of meeting the objection. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] says there ought to be a right in the United States to condemn a way to the water for persons owning stock. Now, a provision might very well be inserted here reserving to all cattle owners a right of way to streams when they would fence both sides of the way; some provision of that kind. But if you apply the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] to those portions of the country like Alabama, Mississippi, or any portions of this country where streams are very frequent, you will in the first place prevent the settler from using the bank of the stream as his fence. You will compel him to build a fence between himself and the water. You will compel him to fence himself out from the water. Why should you do that? Is it necessary in order to reach the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] that you should deprive every owner of the right to clear immediately up to the stream; of the right to take the stream into his field if he wants to?

The convenience to himself for watering his stock renders it very essential, it seems to me, that he should have the right to cross the stream with his fences, or certainly to build up to the stream. I therefore think this amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. HERMANN. What would be the result in this case, so far as the guaranty of a right of way to the stream is concerned?

Mr. HERBERT. Nothing in the world. They are not guarantied the right of way now. Suppose this amendment is passed. Here is an alternate section 1,000 feet long and 100 feet wide, surrounded on three sides by the land of private individuals. This gives no right of way at all. How are you going to get to the strip of land?

Mr. WEAVER. By the public highway.

Mr. HERBERT. It would be better to present an amendment giving the right of way to any person who was a stockholder, or who desired to get to the water, upon building the necessary fences, so as to protect the riparian property. That sort of amendment would be very well, but this amendment is too ill-digested and does not reach the difficulty the gentleman has in view.

Mr. WEAVER. Then let the gentleman draw up a better amendment.

Mr. HERBERT. Anybody can do that.

Mr. WEAVER. Do it. Do not talk about it; but do it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LAIRD was recognized.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about this proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Nebraska. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana hereafter.

Mr. LAIRD. I wish to say a word about this proposition.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, probably any man who has ever traveled west of the one hundredth meridian in this country has had a considerable amount of amusement but a larger amount of mortification from the light which has been cast upon this subject by gentlemen like the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO]. It is a convenient thing to say that the settler, the man who stands on the ground, is a thief, to the end that he may be prejudiced in the minds of gentlemen who know nothing about it; and so accordingly upon that string all the thousands of those who sing the song of reform are forever playing.

So, then, the man who stands at the bottom and has nothing furnished him but the pluck of a human being, and the earth and air and water which God gives to all of us, is a thief! The next man who comes in for the condemnation of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] and others like him, who know nothing of what they are talking about, is the "cattle monopolist," and the next scoundrel in the West is the "syndicate," whatever that may be. So that here we are crucified like the thieves upon the cross, only there is one more than tradition tells us there were on that occasion. They hold us up to ignominy before the world, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], who ought to be bound to these pioneers of the West by sympathy for the labors and hardships they have undergone, comes in here and takes part in holding them up to obloquy.

Mr. WEAVER. The thieves on the cross were very different, because they repented, but you do not. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAIRD. We do not repent, for the righteous are not called to repentance. We are not here to give you judgment by confession, like a band of criminals and cowards.

Mr. WEAVER. What is the matter with you? [Laughter.]

Mr. LAIRD. Nothing. "I am all right;" only I do not propose to be labeled a thief by every demagogue that mistakes notoriety for reputation. These gentlemen talk about the cattle-men. Is there any man on this floor who is ignorant of the fact that it takes 34 acres of this land, which you are talking of splitting up into rods, feet, and inches, to graze one steer for a year? Gentlemen talk about the cattle-men entering into a conspiracy to get land enough to raise a thousand head of cattle on. Why, everybody who knows anything about it knows that the minute they have got to buy the land, that minute they move off. If by holding 160 acres they can hold grazing ground for a thousand head or ten thousand head, they hold it, but when they have to buy the land they move off elsewhere. Now, where do these men come from that I am defending here, and that gentlemen on the other side are holding up to obloquy? They come from Texas and Missouri. They are Democrats, and they do not spend their time in invoking blessings upon your heads. If there is any man here who does not know that the cattle business now and always has been impossible where the owner of the herd had to own the land on which it ranged, then your ignorance amounts to imbecility.

Again, gentlemen talk about fences, and draw a fancy picture with which to harrow up the fears of those who are ignorant of the whole matter. I have been inside those inclosures, and what have I found to be the verdict of the homesteader? He says, "Great God! let the fences alone. They furnish me a sure pasturage for my little bunch of cattle so that I know where they are, but if the fences are torn down I shall not know where they range, and I can not afford to herd them." Misfortune has in many cases robbed the cattle men of 75 per cent. of their herds, and at least half of that loss is due to the fact that they have dammed up the flight of the cattle toward the south when the cold blasts of the north come down upon them, by wire fences. Run a 20-mile fence across a trail so as to cut off the flight of the cattle, and what happens? They die and are piled up by the thousand at the barrier. And long before the proclamation of the Executive the cattle men were willing to take down the fences and get rid of them.

Now, as to the question presented by the amendment, if there is anything to be done, let it be the reservation of every permanent water course, and not the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], because that is entirely useless.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the Clerk to read the sixteenth section of this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That the right to the use of water by the person or persons conducting the same on or to any tract of desert land so entered shall depend upon bona fide appropriation, and such right shall not exceed the amount of water actually appropriated and necessarily used for the purpose of irrigation and reclamation, and all surplus water over and above such actual appropriation and use, together with the water of all lakes, rivers, and other sources of water supply upon the public lands and not navigable, shall remain and be held free for the appropriation and use of the public for irrigation, mining, and manufacturing purposes, subject to existing rights.

Mr. HOLMAN. That, of course, refers only to lands in the desert portions of the United States; but this legislation is of more importance there than in any other part of the country. In studying this subject it seems to be almost impossible to legislate so as to secure for all persons settling upon the public lands in the drier portions of the country the use of the water. The subject is a very embarrassing one, but I think the provision which has been read in section 16, with perhaps some enlargement, goes as far as we can successfully go in that direction. I should be very glad indeed if we could adopt something broader, more comprehensive, and more certain to furnish security against the monopoly of water; and I think that any suggestion made to that end ought to be acceptable, but I do not think the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] is practical. Some objections to it have been pointed out, and there are others; and I do not see that we can hope to accomplish much beyond what is provided in section 16. I suggest that for the present we pass over this amendment, and that the gentleman study the sixteenth section of the bill to see whether he can not accomplish his object, in some degree at least, by a modification of that section.

Mr. HERBERT. I wish to suggest a difficulty in regard to this amendment. The amendment applies to all water courses; that means water courses of any size; it would include a branch; and under this amendment the settler would be deprived of any right to fence in a branch upon his land, if it were capable of being used as a stream for watering cattle.

Mr. WEAVER. Oh, no.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I drew up a proposition which I submitted to the Committee on Public Lands, providing in effect that in all cases of sales of public lands bordering upon rivers or other bodies of water the water should be subject to such legislation as Congress, or, after the formation of State and Territorial governments, those governments, might deem necessary for the protection of the interests of all persons purchasing lands in the vicinity of those water sections. I am aware that this is substantially the law now in at least a portion of the United States. Whether it could be extended further I have great doubt.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I agree with what has been said by the chairman of the committee [Mr. HOLMAN]. I think the adoption of this amendment would be dangerous. Section 16, it seems to me, provides about all the remedy for the evil complained of which can be provided by Congress. If any more can be given it ought to be in the form of an amendment to that section. Certainly portions of country like Arkansas, Louisiana, and Mississippi ought not to be subjected to such a provision as that proposed by the gentleman from Iowa. On many of the farms in my State there are creeks and branches running through, coursing in the manner represented on this diagram [illustrating]. Now, under the gentleman's amendment, in order to permit the stock of a man who owns land back here away from the stream, [illustrating] to get to water over here, the man who owns the land must build a crooked lane and fence himself off from the stream and lead his own stock to water, although he may have homesteaded the land. Is that what my friend wants?

Mr. WEAVER. Not at all.

Mr. MCRAE. Then your amendment does not mean what it says. Now, we have provided for a road upon every section line, so that these streams will be accessible at every place they cross such lines.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reservation of a width of 2 rods on each side of every section line for public highways is far-reaching in its beneficial effects. Of course it is impossible to monopolize completely the water in any section of the country.

Mr. MCRAE. If it runs across one section of land into another it is.

Mr. WEAVER. Gentlemen will, however, observe that the reservation for public highways does not take effect until action has been had by the State or Territorial Legislature. Now, the cattle men get into the new portions of the country, get control of the local government, and exclude other settlers from the water. There may not be a time within twenty years when you can get a highway opened up so that the body of the people can reach that water. These highways, although the land is expressly dedicated for them, may be closed up.

Mr. MCRAE. The condition of affairs described by the gentleman may exist in some sections of the country, but not in Arkansas. There is no danger of any "cattle syndicate" or any other kind of syndicate getting possession of the streams in the country I come from. They can neither be bought nor stolen. We can certainly trust the State and Territorial legislatures and county courts to provide public roads.

Mr. WEAVER. That is true.

Mr. MCRAE. If any such legislation as that proposed in the gentleman's amendment is to be adopted, I shall insist that my section of the country at least be exempted from it. My people can not afford to go into the business of fencing branches, creeks, and everything of that kind. The rivers are already reserved for the purposes of commerce; we have public roads, and under the right of eminent domain may open more across sections as well as upon sectional lines. It is useless to say that the people of this country can not protect themselves against the troubles which gentlemen apprehend. When those difficulties arise, we will meet them. This is not the way to meet them. I am willing to trust these matters to the States. In California and other desert land States, where it has been necessary to irrigate the land, State laws have been enacted for the purpose of regulating it. So far as the Territories are concerned, if we want to adopt a system of irrigation, we have the power and can do so later. But this is not the time nor the place for entering upon that subject. This bill should not be weighted with this provision, in my judgment, with regard to any part of the country; certainly such a provision should not be general ini ts application.

Mr. WEAVER obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the gentleman proceeds, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be limited to ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, the central idea of my amendment is to preserve access to water for the poor people settling in the Territories. We all understand that the abuse at which the amendment strikes actually exists. It is a very easy matter for the gentleman from Arkansas to stand up here and criticise this amendment, though for some reason he appears not to be able to offer a better one himself.

The criticism would destroy it entirely. Why do we not provide for the safety of the public domain through safeguards round the land itself to prevent fraud being practiced by designing and dishonest men to deprive settlers of the right and title to their lands? There is a disposition on the part of corporations to prevent them acquiring the public domain in order that they may be able to acquire it for themselves.

Now, one convenient method by which they are enabled to acquire these public lands is, in the first place they acquire the water-front, and then all the public lands as far as you can ride soon fall into their hands. It is one of their methods to cut the people off from water, so that they can neither irrigate their lands nor water their stock. That is one of the evils which I desire to remove.

I concede the difficulty of draughting a measure that will be without hardships, but the difficulty of the situation ought not to deter us from doing the very best we can to secure the settlers against injury by avoidance of evils to which I have referred.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not that meet your purpose? Every mile will be opened.

Mr. WEAVER. The difficulty in the section is just this: Under the language of the section contained in the bill, the settler on the public domain is entitled to fence it until the public need it. Now let a company or cattle syndicate enter into a county and fence it so as to exclude the public from the water, you will have no highways.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is an extreme case.

Mr. WEAVER. No, it is not; it is a case which exists in various counties in the West. It is a widespread evil in the West.

I will not say if that section in regard to public highways is so amended as that the purchaser of the soil is allowed to fence it up, but so as to leave the highways all open in order the settlers may get to the public road in order to get to water, very well. By special provision they may be allowed to fence it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Until the public need it.

Mr. MCRAE. Why not allow this matter to remain under the control of the local Legislature?

Mr. WEAVER. They cut off the settlers from access to the water, and then they acquire for themselves all the adjoining property.

Mr. MCRAE. Some of the settlers may want the highway on one side, and some on the other. They do not want a road every mile, but they do want it wherever it may be necessary.

Mr. WEAVER. If the road is too rough to ride, then it is too rough a country to live in.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Speaker, my experience in reference to irrigation and water rights satisfies me that no general law can be passed and meet the requirements of all, for the reason that the conditions under which it would act are so different in different States and Territories and sections of the same. They differ so largely there is no general rule by which Congress can arrive at or do justice as between the parties. What would benefit one locality would ruin the other.

In my own State we require one kind of law in the northern and another for the southern part of the State. In the arid deserts to be found in parts of the Western States and Territories the land is utterly worthless, impossible to inhabit in its natural state; but by the aid of irrigation the face of nature is changed and made not only habitable, but remunerative and profitable.

In some places the expense of furnishing water for irrigation of small tracts is not large, yet in others, and the majority of cases, it is only attainable by large expenditure of capital and time to furnish an adequate quantity of water; in others such are the surrounding circumstances as to make it desirable to leave the water undisturbed in its natural channels, and the common law doctrine of riparian rights is invoked for this purpose.

It would therefore seem to be a part of wisdom to leave the adjudication of this question to what might be called home rule. Let the States and Territories attend to it, each for itself. There is no danger of the settlers being ridden over by a lot of cattle kings or cow boys. They outnumber them numerically and politically. The settlers can take care of themselves and protect themselves when necessary. Only leave them free to act. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. There are objections to this amendment in this respect. The fear of cattle kings of which we hear so much amounts to nothing in our country. Neither syndicates nor indeed anybody else can fence in a live stream. It is impossible for any one to fence in a stream from the use of the settlers who require the water to irrigate their fields and to water their flocks.

The cattle baron and the cattle king of course by his larger herds has more need of water than anybody else. His herds in going to and coming from the water trample the grass all around it on both sides, and the small herder seeks a smaller stream or spring at some other point.

But eventually all of this water course will be used for purposes of irrigation; and there would have to be a right granted by Congress to run a canal across these lands for the purpose of using it in that way. The springs are only used by the cattle for the present, for eventually they will all be taken up for irrigation purposes. The cattle king can not prevent that from being done; and, as has been said by the gentleman from California, as soon as the stream is used for other purposes the cattle will have to be taken elsewhere. This will finally be the result, and this fear, I think, which has been expressed by gentlemen in this debate is entirely unfounded.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WEAVER, the House divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 31.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCADOO. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCADOO. Is it in order now to offer another amendment to this section?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that it is, but that debate, with the exception of one minute which yet remains, has been exhausted.

Mr. MCADOO. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That on and after the passage of this act sufficient public lands of the United States to give passage for man and beast adjoining any living spring, stream, creek, or river of water in any Territory of the United States shall be withdrawn from the public domain as open to settlement under any law or as capable of being purchased. Such land shall be and remain a common, to give free ingress and egress to use such water for legitimate and necessary purposes. The owners of adjacent lands must dedicate and preserve to public use a free and reasonable passage through their lands to such water. Such passage way shall, if necessary, be procured by condemnation for public purposes of the requisite land by commissioners appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, as hereinafter provided for, and paid for out of any moneys remaining in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. That diversion by any means of any stream or living spring of water from its course in such quantities as to destroy or endanger its usefulness to the public shall be a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable for each offense by a fine not exceeding $2,000 or imprisonment for any term not exceeding five years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to offer a further amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That wherever in this act the expression "quarter-section, or 160 acres" is used it shall be held to include all of the land found to be contained in any subdivision known as a quarter-section, although it may be fractional and may contain more than 160 acres.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the words "or less" ought to be added, so that it will read:

May contain more or less than 160 acres.

Mr. PLUMB. I accept that modification.

Mr. Speaker, the effect——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that but one minute remains for debate upon the pending paragraph.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well.

I desire to say that complications and serious difficulties have arisen because there was not a clear expression of law in respect to what constitutes a quarter-section, or 160 acres. In one instance in my own knowledge a homestead had been located upon that which was in excess of 160 acres, and in consequence a serious difficulty arose in settling the question as to the title——

Mr. HERMANN. Let me ask if the Department itself and the law does not permit the purchase of the excess over 160 acres?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, it may be so, but the object now is to give the lands to the actual settler, and wherever the settlement is upon 160 acres, or a quarter-section, it declares the meaning of the act when that term is used in the bill.

The amendment was adopted.

Section 29 of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 29. That chapter 4 of Title XXXII, excepting sections 2275, 2276, 2286, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and all other laws allowing pre-emption of the public lands of the United States, and an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled an act to encourage the growth of timber on the Western prairies," approved June 14, 1878, an act entitled "An act to provide for sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories," approved March 3, 1877, and also sections 2288 and 2301, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and all other laws in conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed, but all bona fide claims lawfully initiated before the passage of this act, under any of said provisions of law so repealed, may be perfected upon due compliance with law, in the same manner, upon the same terms and conditions, and subject to the same limitations, forfeitures, and contests, as if this act had not been passed, and at the uniform price of $1.25 per acre when payment is required by law, and all existing laws in relation to bounty-land warrants and college and other land scrip, and the location thereof, except that the same shall not be located on reserved lands, and all of the existing provisions of law in relation to town-sites on the public domain, and provisions of law in relation to swamp lands, and other grants made by Congress to States and Territories, shall remain in full force.

The pending amendment, offered by Mr. MCRAE, was read, as follows:

After the word "one," in line 13, section 29, insert "two thousand three hundred and forty-five."

Mr. MCRAE. I will ask the Clerk to read the section proposed to be repealed, which is the section which exempts Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan from the operation of the mineral-land act.

Mr. WEAVER. That is all right.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2345. The provisions of the preceding sections of this chapter shall not apply to the mineral lands situated in the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, which are declared free and open to exploration and purchase according to legal subdivisions in like manner as before the 10th day of May, 1872; and bona fide entries of such lands within the States named since the 10th day of May, 1872, may be patented without reference to any of the foregoing provisions of this chapter. Such lands shall be offered for public sale in the same manner, at the same premium, price, and under the same rights of pre-emption as other public lands.

The amendment of Mr. MCRAE was adopted.

The amendment proposed by Mr. DORSEY was read, as follows:

Insert, in line 2, section 29, after "sections," "2259, 2260, 2262, 2263, 2264, 2267, 2273."

Mr. HOLMAN. That is to restore the pre-emption law——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will desist for a moment to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which it requested the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. 1631) to incorporate the Washington and Sandy Springs Narrow-Gauge Railroad and Street Railway Company;

A bill (S. 2831) for improving the mouth of the Brazos River, Texas; and

A bill (S. 1361) to provide for the reduction of the Round Valley Indian reservation in the State of California, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the House, the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain bounty or enlisted men in the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion.

AMENDMENTS TO LAND LAW.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the pending amendment I only wish to remark that this is the commutation clause of the homestead law, and of course ought not to be passed.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk reported the next amendment, as follows:

By Mr. CAREY:

Amend by adding as an additional section:

"SEC. —. That section 2 of the act of June 15, 1880, entitled 'An act relating to the public lands,' is hereby declared applicable to any entry made previous to January 1, 1888, under the homestead, desert-land, or pre-emption laws which had been improved in value previous to the last-named date by means of irrigation, works constructed for its reclamation, water rights, breakage of soil, or other improvements on the land to an amount equal to $2 per acre."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

SEC. —. That persons who have heretofore under any of the homestead, desert-land, or pre-emption laws entered lands properly subject to such entries, or persons to whom the rights of those having so entered lands under the laws named may have been attempted to be transferred by bona fide instrument in writing, may entitle themselves to said land by paying the Government price therefor, and in no case less than $1.25 an acre, and the amount heretofore paid the Government upon said lands shall be taken as part payment of said price: Provided, That no one shall avail himself of the provisions of this section unless the lands contained in the entry effected on the 1st day of January, 1888, had been improved in value by irrigation works for the reclamation of the lands, water rights, buildings, or other improvements thereon, to an amount equal to $2 an acre for each acre contained in the entry: Provided further, That this section shall not interfere with the rights of any one who may have subsequently entered any of such lands therein described under either of the laws referred to in this section.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk reported the next amendment, as follows:

Amend by adding the following sections to the bill:

"SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to have the lands embraced within abandoned military reservations regularly surveyed by an extension of the public surveys thereon.

"SEC. —. That said lands when so surveyed shall, upon the approval of such surveys by the Secretary of the Interior, become a part of the public domain and subject to entry and settlement under the homestead laws of the United States, and not otherwise.

"SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause any improvements, buildings, building materials, and other property which may be situated upon such lands, not heretofore sold by the United States authorities, to be appraised by three competent and disinterested men, to be appointed by him, who shall, after each having been duly sworn to impartially and faithfully execute the trust imposed in him, appraise the said improvements, buildings, building materials, and other property situate thereon, and report their proceedings to the Secretary of the Interior for his action thereon; and thereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the same to be advertised for sale at public auction, to the highest bidder, for cash, in at least two newspapers of general circulation published in the State or Territory where said reservation is situated for four successive weeks, giving the time and place of said sale. Any sale of improvements made under the provisions of this act shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

"SEC. —. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed."

Mr. TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, the object and purpose of this bill, as frequently declared in the House, is to reserve the public land of the United States for the benefit of actual settlers. The amendment which I have offered is in keeping with the spirit and purpose of the bill. The act of July 5, 1884, for the disposition of abandoned and useless military reservations, provides for selling these reservations at public sale to the highest bidder. The result is and has been since the passage of the act that instead of these lands falling into the hands of actual settlers or of homesteaders, they have fallen into the hands of capitalists and individuals who have combined to buy the whole of the land or so much thereof as they deemed necessary for the purpose intended by the purchase. This matter has been brought to the attention of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in his last annual report he says:

Complaints and protests continue to be received at this office against the sale at public auction of lands embraced in relinquished military reservations. These reservations embrace some of the choicest remaining agricultural lands of the United States, and are needed for settlement purposes. It is impossible for settlers to compete with capitalists at public sales, and if sold in that manner the lands are certain to pass into the hands of large proprietors, from whom the farmer hereafter can purchase, if it all, only at greatly enhanced rates. The general situation and the condition public feeling in respect to the manner of disposing of these reservations is shown in the following letter from the register and receiver at Bozeman, Mont.

The register and receiver write with special reference to the Fort Ellis military reservation, which has been abandoned, and which contains 34,000 acres of land and is unoccupied at this time. They say in their letter:

UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE,
Bozeman, Mont., February 14, 1887.

SIR: We, in response to public request and from our own convictions in the premises, respectfully call your attention to the matter of the disposal of the Fort Ellis military reservation, that having been determined and placed in the hands of the Interior Department.

We believe that the best interests of the Government and of our people would be met, not by its sale in large or small bodies, but by its relegation to the public lands and its disposal under the land laws of the United States.

This reserve contains over 32,000 acres, and consists of agricultural, grass, timber, stone, coal, and mineral lands. It commands available irrigating water, and is one of the best locations in this Territory and the best on many accounts now remaining unsettled in this land office district.

It would be rapidly taken up by bona fide settlers and locators, and should it be sold, as seems now intended, the result in our opinion would be damaging to public interest and a great disappointment to our people. Already we hear of syndicates formed to attempt its purchase in a body. This we and all good citizens would deplore, as such disposal would not only prevent its general settlement, and consequent general improvement, materially depriving the country of tax-paying property and added population, but it would establish almost within our little city, and between us and the Yellowstone, a monopoly of lands which it is rightly the policy of the Government and the Department and the people to discourage.

The available lands of this district are not so great in extent that this country and Territory can afford to quietly witness such disposal of this extensive and valuable area, and we feel that, under the circumstances, we can consistently address you upon the subject.

A petition has gone forward asking the donation of a small area, with the buildings thereon, of this reserve to the Territory for insane asylum purposes. This we have had the honor to indorse, and we feel that our present recommendation regarding the remainder of this land covers a duty we owe to all concerned in the matter. We therefore respectfully submit the matter, feeling that you will consider our motives, and, if possible, take steps to secure the object in view.

Respectfully,

GEO. W. MONROE, Register.
WM. A. IMES, Receiver.

HON. COMMISSIONER GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C.

The amendment which I have suggested provides that these lands shall be taken up only under the homestead laws of the United States; and in that respect it comports with the object and purpose of the bill introduced by the Committee on the Public Lands. I therefore hope the House will adopt this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The question of how the military reservations should be disposed of is quite an interesting one. It is very clear that the principle of the homestead law should be applied to those abandoned reservations where it can be properly applied, and up to this time I think Congress has uniformly, by special acts applicable to particular reservations, provided for the disposal of such lands in that way.

Mr. TOOLE. There is a general law, passed in 1884, providing for the sale of the military reservations at public auction.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that; but I say I think that Congress has generally or uniformly provided, by special acts, the manner in which those lands should be disposed of, always securing to actual settlers the benefit of the provisions of the homestead law. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a class of cases for which it is difficult to legislate in that general way. I refer to cases where the lands have been rendered especially valuable by the settlement of the surrounding country.

Take, for instance, the case referred to by the gentleman from Montana—the Bozeman reservation. That comprises a fine body of land amounting to some thirty or forty thousand acres. It is in a settled country. These lands have been rendered valuable by the improvement of the surrounding country, and the principle of the homestead act does not seem to apply in such a case. The object of the homestead law is to create the largest possible number of homesteads, of freeholds, but to create them out of lands that are public—lands to which people from all sections of the country can go and make settlements; but where there is already a large settlement surrounding a reservation it is easy to see that whether you dispose of the lands by public sale or under the homestead law a few persons will obtain the benefit of them, and those will be generally persons who have settled upon the lands without any regard to the question of whether they were reservations or not. Now, if the lands have been increased greatly in value by the common labor of the whole people, it would seem that the benefit of the increase should go to the Government.

On the other hand, where the value has been increased in that manner, the land certainly ought to be disposed of under the homestead law. For instance, take the case of Fort Wallace; it is very clear that the provisions of the homestead law should apply to that reservation, and undoubtedly they should apply in all cases where there are no special reasons or circumstances against it, as there are in cases where the value of the lands have been greatly increased by surrounding settlement. The act of 1884 simply provides that the lands shall be sold to the highest bidder. I believe in limited tracts; but this bill itself provides that these reservations shall be disposed of only under acts of Congress specially applicable thereto.

Where lands are very valuable it seems to me that to give one citizen or one class of citizens priority over others would be very unjust, and certainly it would be unjust to give to one citizen a quarter-section of land which had been rendered very valuable by the improvement of the surrounding country while others taking under the same law obtained lands of very inferior value. Therefore in the cases of these reservations, where the lands have been improved in value by settlement of the surrounding country, if you are going to apply the principle of the homestead law at all, I think you ought to reduce the amount of land that can be taken in each case. On the whole it seems to me well to let the matter rest where it does now. In proper cases the Interior Department will act under the law of 1884, and this bill contains provisions that these reservations shall be disposed of under special acts. While I fully sympathize with the spirit of my friend's amendment, and would go to the outer edge to secure the benefit of these lands to homestead settlers, it seems to me that this is a matter as to which we can not properly adopt a general rule.

Mr. TOOLE. I would like to know what the gentleman from Indiana would have us do. Here is a tract of land embracing 30,000 acres—capable of furnishing homes for eight hundred homesteaders, which is under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, with a guard in possession so that no man is permitted to go upon it and originate an entry—30,000 acres, embracing some of the best agricultural lands in the county of Gallatin, lying idle, producing nothing, contributing nothing to the support of the Government; and the question is, is that land to be permitted to lie there indefinitely, or what would the gentleman have us do with it?

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, my friend himself has a bill pending to dispose of that reservation.

Mr. TOOLE. And it is identical in its provisions with this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. But that bill, I think, ought to be amended. I believe there is a special report upon the subject from the Commissioner of the General Land Office; at least I have talked fully with him on the subject. I think that bill ought to be passed, but with some modification. Some of those lands are immensely valuable as compared with the lands generally taken up under the homestead laws, and I think the homesteads granted should be limited to a certain portion of the reservation, and I believe my friend holds that view himself. I think the bill should be amended so as to permit some portions of the land to be sold and the balance to be taken under the homestead law, reducing the amount, however, from 160 acres to 80 acres.

A MEMBER. Let us pass this amendment making the amount 80 acres.

Mr. HOLMAN. That will not do either, because in some parts of the reservation no improvements have been made, and in those portions of it I think the full amount of 160 acres should be allowed for a homestead. It seems to me, in view of all the circumstances, that it is better to pass special laws from time to time applicable to particular cases as they arise, just as we have done heretofore, than to attempt to adopt any general principle to govern all cases. I know that a portion of the Bozeman reservation ought to come under the provisions of the homestead law, a portion under this bill, and another portion, not a large one, ought to be sold.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TOOLE, it was rejected.

The following amendment (offered by Mr. VANDEVER) was read:

Add the following proviso to the last line of the bill:

"Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to legalize assignments heretofore made by claimants under the desert-land act of the rights acquired by them as locators on these lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right. While I do not think there is anything in the bill which could have the effect against which the amendment proposes to guard, yet if there is anything of that sort the amendment is very proper.

Mr. VANDEVER. I modify the amendment by adding to it the words "prior to making improvement thereon."

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the next amendment, when

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, said: Mr. Speaker, I rose for the purpose of addressing myself to the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. VANDEVER]. I would like the Clerk to read that amendment again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment has been adopted; but by unanimous consent it will be again read.

The amendment of Mr. VANDEVER as adopted was read.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted. To the amendment as printed in the list of amendments I have no objection whatever; but the gentleman from California has just added to it these words, "prior to making improvement thereon."

Now, it is a fact—at least it is alleged to be a fact, and the statement has been repeated over and over again in the reports of the Commissioner of the General Land Office—that vast frauds have been committed in the assignment of those desert-land entries. The matter is now being investigated by special agents; and a great many of those entries stand suspended during such investigation. It is probable, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment as now adopted would, if any improvements have been made, have the effect of confirming in the assignees the assignments of thousands of those entries which are now being investigated by the Land Department. I think, therefore, the amendment in the form in which it has been adopted is a dangerous proposition.

Mr. VANDEVER. I am willing that the words which I added to my amendment a few moments ago may be stricken out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was not aware that any addition had been made to the amendment as printed.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. If those words be stricken out, there is no objection to the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The words "prior to making improvements thereon" will be stricken out, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The following amendment (offered by Mr. WICKHAM) was read:

Add as follows:

"SEC. 30. Nothing in this act contained shall in any manner interfere with or curtail the right of soldiers, sailors, marines, or officers in the Army or Navy of the United States to make and perfect entries of land for homestead purposes, in the manner and to the extent now provided by law."

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, of course there would be no objection to this amendment but for the fact that its provisions are already a part of the law. Gentlemen will observe that in this bill we simply adopt the homestead law in terms, with the commutation clause stricken out. The homestead law contains these provisions in favor of the soldier. Under the terms of this bill every right of the soldier is guarded exactly as it has been heretofore. As to this amendment, I suggest that it presents an ambiguity. While it will do the soldier no good, it may, as suggested to me by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], have the effect of restoring the commutation clause as to the soldier; and certainly no gentleman intends that.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected.

The following amendment (offered by Mr. LIND) was read:

Add as an additional section the following:

"SEC. —. That in all actions brought by any land-grant company, or by any person claiming title under or through such company, against any actual settler occupying not to exceed 160 acres of land which he in good faith entered upon, intending to claim the same under any of the public-land laws of the United States, such settler may raise and interpose as a defense in such action any mistake, error, or mistaken construction of an act of Congress by the Interior or Executive Department, or any officer thereof, which may have resulted in an erroneous certification or patent of such land to such land-grant company or to a State for its benefit; and such settler may also raise and interpose as a defense in such action any question which the United States might by its Attorney-General raise by a bill in equity to set aside such patent or certificate, and such defense shall be given the same effect as if the questions so presented had been so raised by the Attorney-General in such suit."

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, one word probably is all that is necessary in reference to this matter.

Mr. OATES. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] a modification of the amendment, which I think would improve it. I suggest the amendment should include a provision that if the court should find that a patent has been fraudulently or improperly issued it may cancel the same.

Mr. LAIRD. I see no objection to that.

Mr. OATES. In the absence of such a provision, the suit for cancellation would have to be a direct one. I suggest that the language of the amendment be made broad enough to accomplish the purpose I have suggested.

Mr. PAYSON. Perhaps an amendment in the form proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] would go a little too far. The cancellation of a patent is a matter in which the Government of the United States is directly interested. For the purpose of the litigation contemplated in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, it would be sufficient if the court should find for the settler without making any judgment which would affect the United States. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota would be improved by an addition which I shall offer a little later, providing in substance that the judgment of the court in these cases shall not bind the United States unless the United States be a party. If the United States were a party, then the suggestion made by the gentleman from Alabama would be eminently proper.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman would improve his amendment by adding to it a provision "that in the State where the patent was adjudged to be illegal, or to have been illegally and improperly issued, that the court trying the case may cancel it."

Mr. PAYSON. It can not be done unless the Government of the United States is a party to the proceedings.

Mr. OATES. Under existing law a patent can not be canceled or annulled except in a direct proceeding in the name of the United States.

Mr. PAYSON. It is not necessary for the purpose sought to be accomplished by this amendment.

Mr. OATES. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois in what he has stated.

Mr. LAIRD. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LAIRD. It will be remembered that in the Forty-ninth Congress a case arose in which Congress appropriated $250,000 to make good the loss sustained by certain settlers in Nebraska and Kansas by reason of the failure of the patent of the United States, which patent failed by reason of a grant made to a railroad company which was prior to it, and after the settlers had been in possession of the land for ten or twelve years, and their lands had to be given up to the company, it being decided by the court that the settlers held the legal title in trust for the benefit of the road. These settlers afterwards came to Congress for relief, and Congress gave it to them. It cost us $250,000 to make good this trouble growing out of the failure of the title held by these settlers. It afterwards transpired on investigation that under the grant made to this railway company they had received more lands than they were entitled to. Now, could the settlers in that litigation have plead that fact, the action of the railroad company would have been defeated, and the settlers would have saved their lands and the Government all the trouble and expense which resulted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman uses the word "company" in two or three places, and I suggest that he use instead the word "corporation."

Mr. LAIRD. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will be modified in that particular.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me this is a fair provision. It only gives to the actual settler on the land the benefit.

Mr. RYAN. It should be adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. LAIRD. I do.

Mr. PAYSON. I move the following amendment, to come in at the end of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment:

"And the judgment of the court shall not bind the United States unless it shall be a party to the litigation."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. LIND'S amendment as amended.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I move in line 3, page 18, after the word "company," to insert:

Or any person holding a grant from any foreign government.

Mr. RYAN. I do not think the gentleman is offering an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Yes, sir; it comes in that amendment.

Mr. RYAN. I have not the bill before me, but the gentleman may be right.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I have the printed copy.

Mr. RYAN. Let the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arizona will prepare his amendment and send it up.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I move the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND].

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "company," in line 3, insert:

"Or any person holding a grant from any foreign government."

Mr. PAYSON. Where does it come in?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. After the word "company," in line 3, page 18. So it will read:

"That in all actions brought by any land-grant company or any person holding a grant from any foreign government."

Mr. RYAN. That is all right.

The amendment was agreed to; and Mr. LIND'S amendment as amended was then adopted.

[Mr. WHEELER withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, my colleague is quite right, if this bill does not require a reclassification of lands and the character of lands under existing law designated as mineral lands in Alabama. I know a good deal about the trouble the smaller settlers upon this land have who went in and took it under the homestead law. In some cases they lost their land when it was ascertained that only a very small portion, sometimes only one or two acres, of a homestead was mineral. In the Forty-eighth Congress there was a law being executed under which all the mineral lands had been advertised for sale. There was so much objection to that law that one of my colleagues, Mr. Hewitt, introduced a bill for the purpose of suspending the order and preventing the sale. I prepared a substitute, or an elaborate amendment, which I offered, and which was adopted in the House, providing for the disposal of all those lands under the homestead law. To that amendment was added the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Florida. It passed the House, but failed in the Senate. Again in the last Congress a single bill was introduced here and favorably reported, and I am not sure but it passed also. The true character of those lands is that upon nearly every 160 acres that can be found there is some valuable agricultural land and some mineral land. All through that section there are small mountains or hills and valleys, and in the valleys homesteaders can find valuable agricultural land; but when surveyed it turns out almost invariably that they take in some portion of the hills, nearly all of which contain valuable mineral. Now, under the provision of this bill, if these lands are to be reclassified under the clause which provides that if they are more valuable for mineral than agricultural purposes then they are to be disposed of only as mineral lands, but if more valuable for agricultural purposes then they are to be disposed of as agricultural lands—if that is contemplated, if that is to be done, then the amendment of my colleague is useless. But if it is not to be done, or is to be long postponed, his amendment is a proper one and I would like to see it adopted.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen at one glance will see that there is much difficulty in the classification of these lands where minerals are, in such small quantities, interspersed throughout that whole section of country. The mineral lands can be bought now and are offered at private sale at from $3 to $10 an acre. If these lands are set apart as mineral lands, to be disposed of under this bill, the Government will not sell 50,000 acres in five years, in all probability.

Mr. HERMANN. Does not the gentleman understand that according to section 2 such classification will be made?

Mr. OATES. I am not sure. I put that question to the chairman and members of the Public Land Committee having the bill in charge whether that is their construction; whether it is the purpose of this provision in the bill that there shall be a reclassification of all these lands?

I wish to say one word more, and that is that if such is the contemplation or the purpose of the bill it seems to me that the machinery provided for that purpose is very defective.

Mr. HERMANN. As a matter of information, may I ask the gentleman what is the preponderating character of those lands, I mean as to their agricultural or their mineral value?

Mr. OATES. Well, on 160 acres of land you would find perhaps only two or three acres of mineral, and the question whether the land was more valuable for agriculture or for minerals would depend of course on the character and richness of the mineral found.

Mr. HERMANN. Then I understand the gentleman is in doubt as to whether these lands would be classified as mineral or agricultural?

Mr. OATES. I presume that some parts of them would be classified under the reclassification as mineral land and other parts as agricultural land, but I think the majority, perhaps two-thirds or three-fourths, would be classified as agricultural.

Mr. HERMANN. Then do you agree with your colleague who preceded you [Mr. WHEELER] that should they be classified more distinctively as mineral than as agricultural, they should be subject to disposal under the homestead law?

Mr. OATES. My own opinion is and has been all the time that these mineral lands so classified could be disposed of with most advantage to the Government, and particularly to the State of Alabama, by being classified as agricultural lands and disposed of to homesteaders, because when the poor homesteader settles upon his 160 acres of land, most of which is valley and good agricultural land, if there are a few acres upon it that are valuable for minerals, I would much rather he should have the benefit of it rather than give it to monopolists to lock it up, and keep it out of the market in that way.

Mr. HERMANN. The gentleman will find that under a liberal construction of section 2 of this bill, although a tract of land may be more valuable for mineral than for agricultural purposes, it still can not be classified as mineral if it be at all fit for cultivation. In other words, it must be unfit for cultivation to enable it to be classified as mineral land.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman's construction of the provision may be correct, but where is the machinery provided in this bill for any immediate or early classification? I do not see it, and therefore I favor the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. HERMANN. I hope we shall have a vote now upon the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. WHEELER, and it was rejected—ayes 19, noes 32.

Mr. OATES. I desire to offer an amendment to section 2, which has been passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The section has been passed, but there was an agreement to recur to it.

Mr. WHEELER. I offer an amendment to the pending section, which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Upon and after the 1st day of January, 1891, the public lands in the State of Alabama which may then be vacant or unoccupied shall be held subject to entry and settlement under the homestead laws.

Mr. WHEELER. This is similar to the amendment that I offered before, except that it extends the time one year more, giving nearly three years for these lands to be sold under the provisions of this act. Now, sir, I say that for Congress to refuse to adopt this amendment is to refuse to follow the expressions upon this subject of all parties for a period of sixty years past. When the Land Office tells us that these lands are of a character that they can not be disposed of as mineral lands, and we know that they are of a character which will justify people going onto them and making homes, how can Congress hesitate, after giving three years for their disposal, to say that at the end of that time the poor laboring man shall be permitted to go upon those lands and make himself a home. And, Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentlemen upon the other side of the House that this bill will benefit most the people of a locality in my State which sent 2,591 soldiers to the Federal Army. They are not in my district. I am not appealing for my district. I am appealing for the district represented by my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD]. But the men who do live in that locality and who appeal to Congress to pass this law are the men, or the sons of men, who furnished nearly 2,600 soldiers to the Federal Army.

Mr. HERMANN. Does not this law give those men that privilege?

Mr. WHEELER. It gives it to them after they have spent five times the value of the land in contesting for it. Lawyers' fees and land-office fees will make it impossible for them to acquire land, unless you let this amendment come in and give them the unrestricted right of making entries under the homestead law, after the Government has had three years and has failed to sell this land under any other law.

Mr. HERMANN. If I understand properly the effect of this bill, it will classify as agricultural lands such lands as the gentleman refers to, and will make them subject to the provisions of the homestead law.

Mr. WHEELER. It may or it may not do that. All these lands of which I speak have, I admit, some tincture of mineral about them, but not enough to make them so valuable as to be bought for mineral lands.

Mr. HERMANN. But under this bill, if they are at all fit for cultivation, however valuable they may be as mineral lands, they are subject to the homestead law.

Mr. WHEELER. No. If the greater part of a tract of 160 acres is fit for cultivation, it can be entered under the homestead law, but if the greater part is not fit for cultivation, this can not be done. Hence there arises a question and a contest. The object of this amendment is to relieve the people from the necessity of any such contest. I appeal to gentlemen on this side of the House to do justice to honest, good men; and I appeal to all members of this House who represent States of the North to listen to the appeals of men who listened to their appeals twenty-five years ago.

Mr. HERMANN. Is the Alabama delegation united on this proposition?

Mr. WHEELER. They are united on it in the Senate and in the House.

Mr. HERMANN. Then I will vote for it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph be closed in ten minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me if gentlemen of the House will take the pains to look into this proposition of my colleague for a moment it will present itself to their minds as a perfectly fair one. It is true that this bill provides for a classification of these lands into mineral and agricultural; but it provides that lands which are chiefly valuable for mineral deposits shall not be subject to homestead entry, but shall be held, as under existing law, subject to sale as mineral land.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman does not quote quite accurately the provision of the bill. Of course he desires to be accurate.

Mr. HERBERT. I do.

Mr. PAYSON. In addition to the requirement that the land must be chiefly valuable for mineral deposits, the proposition is that the greater part of it must be unfit for cultivation.

Mr. HERBERT. Yes; the greater part of it must be unfit for cultivation.

Mr. PAYSON. That is a very essential qualification.

Mr. HERBERT. Now, the proposition is, that a tract of land embracing, say, 160 acres, chiefly valuable for mineral deposits, and the greater part of which (say 100 acres) is unfit for cultivation, shall not be subject to homestead entry, but shall be reserved, as now, for sale only as mineral land. Now, suppose there is a subdivision of 160 acres, fairly classified, 60 acres of which are fit for agricultural purposes, but which tract as a whole the officers who classify the land regard as more valuable for mineral deposits than for agricultural purposes. Such a tract is, of course, withdrawn from entry under the homestead law.

Now, according to the proposition of my colleague, if for three years the Government fails to sell that land as mineral land at present prices then it shall be subject to homestead entry. Why not? If the Government is unable to sell it as mineral land at the prices fixed, why should not the land be homesteaded? In the case supposed, 60 acres are agricultural land; the remaining 100 acres may be valuable as timber, as accessory to and a part of a farm. If 60 acres only are fit for agricultural purposes, the remaining 100 acres would be very useful in furnishing timber for necessary purposes about a farm.

In carrying out the general spirit of this bill I do not see why we should not, at the end of three years, allow such land as the Government has been unable to sell for mineral purposes to be entered under the homestead law and settled. That is a simple proposition.

Mr. HERMANN. Is there a large percentage of land in Alabama, chiefly valuable for minerals, and the greater part of which is unfit for cultivation?

Mr. HERBERT. In the mountain country of which I am now speaking there would be a good many subdivisions in just the situation I have supposed, embracing enough agricultural land to justify a man in making a homestead and cultivating a farm, and embracing also land classified as valuable for mineral purposes, yet not valuable enough to induce anybody to buy it as such. If nobody will buy the land for mineral purposes during the next three years this amendment proposes to allow the settler to enter upon the land and make a homestead.

Mr. HERMANN. Your object is to put this land within the reach of settlement?

Mr. HERBERT. The object of the amendment is, in the first place, to give the Government a fair opportunity to sell the land under the classification as mineral; but when it has been found that the land can not be sold as mineral land, if anybody wants to enter it for the purposes of a homestead, why should he not be permitted to do so? Is there any reasonable objection to the proposition? It seems to me there is not.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, a single remark in answer to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT]. This question is not a new one to members of the Committee on Public Lands. When it was before that committee I made inquiry of gentlemen from Alabama, and they were unable to satisfy me that the condition of things in Alabama is different from what it is in other States. I can not, therefore, see any need of making Alabama an exception. I consider the case made out for Alabama just as good as that of numbers of other States—no better. Our land laws should, so far as possible, be general in their provisions. In consequence of the considerations submitted to the committee by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] the committee has been careful to frame this bill in such a way as to make it almost impossible to defeat the purpose which he seeks by the amendment; because when land is classed as mineral it must not only be chiefly valuable for its mineral deposits, but the greater part of it must be unfit for cultivation. I fail to see any reason why Alabama should not be under the same law in this respect as the rest of the country. My State, as well as Alabama, will come under the general provisions of this bill.

Mr. HERBERT. Why should the Government reserve from homestead entry any land which is fit for homestead entry, and which it is unable to dispose of as mineral land? We propose that the Government shall have three years in which to dispose of these lands as mineral lands.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, it is no argument against the proposition now submitted that it would apply equally well to other States as to Alabama. I believe the law should be general; and I think so from the fact that the best policy, in my judgment, is to encourage by every method of legislation the transfer of the public domain from the Government into the hands of the private individual, to such men as propose to make permanent homesteads upon the soil. The homestead, which involves the family relation, is the foundation of all good government, and the more we can encourage the citizenship of the Government to enter into this relationship and acquire permanent homes, the better security we have for the safety and perpetuity of the Government itself.

If a man will go upon any of these lands and live for five years and support his family upon the soil—and he has to do that before he can homestead it at all—it is the securing of a permanent residence upon the soil, and he has become to that extent a valuable citizen—much more so than he was before.

Now, we propose to apply the rule to Alabama simply because there have been objections raised to making it general in its application; and I insist if it be well to have it general, that affords no reason whatever why, if other Representatives from other States object, we should not have it as applying to the State of Alabama.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto has been closed by order of the House.

The question being taken on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. WHEELER, the House divided and there were—ayes 17, noes 31.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHEELER. I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the 1st day of January, 1892, all public lands which shall be unoccupied or not disposed of, shall be subject to homestead entry and occupation under the homestead laws.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be heard for a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate has been closed by order of the House.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEELER. Now this is extending the provision for four years, and I want to explain my reasons in the minute that has been allotted to me.

The section of country affected by the proposed amendment is not in my district, nor are the people in whose interest the amendment is offered my constituents, yet they are poor, honest people, who for six years have appealed to Congress for the right to get their homes upon these lands. My colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] and myself have been so earnest in this matter that we have been asked by some gentlemen what personal interest we had in it. I scorn such a question. I scorn the suggestion that I would advocate on this floor any matter in which I had a personal interest, and with equal earnestness I scorn such a suggestion as applied to my absent friend and colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD]. We are both earnest in the advocacy of what is right, and we will always remain earnest in such matters. I have an interest in Alabama, in the people of Alabama, in the poor people of Alabama, and it is in their interest alone that I ask you to give this little favor—to tell them that four years from now, if any of these lands remain unoccupied and unpurchased, because they are not worth the price charged in the bill, they shall have the privilege to go upon the lands and build up homes for themselves and their families. This is all they ask.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. WHEELER; and there were—ayes 25, noes 32.

Mr. WHEELER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. WHEELER and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 32, noes 44.

Mr. WHEELER. I withdraw the demand for a quorum.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHEELER. I now offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after the 1st day of July, 1892, all the public lands of the State of Alabama which have not otherwise been disposed of prior to that date shall be subject to homestead entry and occupation under the provisions and limitations of the homestead law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer an amendment to the amendment. After the words "public lands" to insert "except lands chiefly valuable for coal and minerals and not valuable for agriculture."

I will state that that is the proposition of the bill, so that the amendment would mean practically nothing.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was adopted, there being on a division—ayes 31, noes 13.

The amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there is a pending amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment (by Mr. PETERS) as follows:

Add a new section, to come in after section 26, as follows:

"SEC. 27. That whenever final proofs are made before any other officer than the register or receiver, the fees of the officer taking such proofs shall not exceed $3 for each quarter-section or fractional part thereof; and any officer demanding or receiving a greater sum shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished for each and every offense not exceeding $100."

Mr. HOLMAN. That is up for the first time, and I think is fairly subject to the point of order. The bill does not deal with the subject of the administration of the Land Office or the system and machinery employed there. I will not make the point of order, although I submit it is subject to it, because this bill has no reference to the administration of the land system, but only to the classification of the lands.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I think that this is a wise provision. Under the general laws the parties living 50 or 75 miles from the land office are allowed to make their proof upon their homestead before the clerk of the district court or the county court. Of course by that means they save the heavy expense of traveling and taking their witnesses with them to the land office. Very frequently these clerks before whom they appear increase their fees to the extent at least allowed by the statute of the State, making those fees amount to $15, and even in some instances to $20. I regard these fees as entirely unreasonable. The clerk of the court is paid a salary in most of the Western States; at least that is true in Kansas. In addition to that he is allowed certain fees regulated by the statute. I think it is unreasonable to allow him to take advantage of that statute regulation, which of course relates to municipal affairs, to bleed the man who desires to make proof upon a homestead. For that reason, and that reason alone I take the ground that this provision should be enacted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say that while this amendment is not in harmony with the general provisions of the bill, it is understood to be a fairly good feature, and does not mar the general character of the bill. So far as I am concerned, I will make no objection to it.

Mr. McSHANE. Under the existing law notaries public and clerks of the district courts in the different counties have the power to take the testimony of the final proof and forward the same to the district land office. In the majority of cases the final proof is taken before the clerk of the district court in the county in which the homestead is located. The existing law does not fix the amount of fees to be charged in such cases; but where the proof is taken before the district land office the fees are limited. The charges usually in such cases before the clerk of the district court and county clerk are from two to five dollars, and are in excess of the amount allowed where the proofs are taken before the register or receiver. An imposition is being practiced all through the West on homesteaders making their final proofs from the fact that even at the exorbitant price charged by those officers it is cheaper than to pay railroad fare in many cases 75 or 100 miles to the district office. I hope the committee will accept this amendment. It is only to guard against the imposition of the officers in the different counties.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I agree to the amendment as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. Under the bill affidavits for making entries may be made before the same officers. We ought to prescribe fees for making these entries as well as for making the proof. If we undertake to legislate upon this subject at all, let us cover the whole ground. Instead of saying "not to exceed $3," we ought to say exactly what the fees shall be; so much for each affidavit and so much for taking such deposition; so that the man will know exactly what he is going to be charged. If I could have a little time I would like to draught a substitute for this amendment. My attention has not been called to the matter before.

Mr. McSHANE. It is a private bargain between the homesteader and the officer.

Mr. McRAE. So is the other. The argument you make in one case can be made in the other case.

Mr. McSHANE. The fees are fixed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman offer a substitute?

Mr. McRAE. I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be laid aside. There are some other amendments to be introduced. We can take up this amendment immediately after the others are disposed of, and then I will submit the substitute.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This completes the amendments that have been printed.

Mr. TOOLE. I desire to offer an amendment I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is in his discretion hereby, authorized to have the lands embraced within abandoned military reservations regularly surveyed by an extension of the public surveys thereon, and when so surveyed shall, upon approval of such surveys by the Secretary of the Interior, become a part of the public domain, subject to entry and settlement under the homestead laws of the United States and not otherwise.

Mr. McRAE. I think that amendment ought to be adopted. I suggest that by unanimous consent, instead of being made an independent section, it be added as a proviso in section 11.

Mr. TOOLE. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no objection to that. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is not consistent with the general features of the bill, but I do not oppose it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OATES. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in at the end of the bill as an independent section.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no alien or person who is not a citizen of the United States shall after the approval of this act acquire title to or own a greater interest than a leasehold for five years in any lands anywhere within the United States of America and their jurisdiction; and deeds or other conveyances of land acquired after the approval of this act by any alien or unnaturalized foreigner, or by any company, firm, or corporation composed of such, shall be void: Provided, That foreign governments and their representatives may acquire and own lands or lots sufficient in quantity for ministerial and legation purposes to be approved by the Secretary of State: Provided further, That any alien may for valuable consideration take, hold, and assign, foreclose and sell under any mortgage or deed of trust any land within the United States and their jurisdiction.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there is a portion of that proposition which is not germane to this bill, the portion of it in regard to ministerial residences, etc., and as to so much of the amendment as is not germane to the bill I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman indicate the portion of the amendment upon which he makes the point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve the point of order upon the whole amendment until the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has been heard.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, it may be admitted that the provisos in the amendment standing alone may not be germane to the bill before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the gentleman? Debate has been closed on this paragraph.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama proposes to add this as a new paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it is simply an amendment to the last section of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think that the close of debate upon the previous paragraph of the bill would necessarily close debate upon an amendment offered as a separate paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. I beg the Chair's pardon, but I feel quite confident that where the debate has closed on the last paragraph of a bill, inasmuch as everything else that comes after that is an amendment to that paragraph, all debate is cut off.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will look into the question.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, on the point of order I was proceeding to say that the question before the House is the disposition of lands belonging to the United States. The amendment which I have offered relates to the capacity of aliens to take and hold lands within the United States. If one proposition is not germane to the other, I must confess that I do not understand very well the signification of that word. I am aware that the point taken against a part of the amendment, as not being germane, is to a very large extent an appeal to the discretion of the Chair. It depends altogether upon what the Chair thinks is germane, and it is a question which can not be settled or governed by precedents. I do not know that I can say anything more on the point of order than that the amendment relates to the disposition of lands of the United States and the capacity of persons who acquire title to those lands.

Mr. KERR. By what provision of the Constitution does Congress have the power to regulate the control of titles to lands in the several States?

Mr. OATES. When we pass beyond the point of order and come to the discussion of the merits of the proposition, I will answer you, and on authority.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Do I understand my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] to propose to incorporate into this bill a provision that a man shall not be permitted to acquire title to a piece of land in this country until he has been here at least five years?

Mr. OATES. Why, certainly; but my friend will excuse me. We are not now discussing the merits of the proposition, and his question goes to the merits. As soon as the Chair overrules the point of order I shall be prepared to discuss the merits.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to reserve the point of order and agree that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] might go on to discuss the merits.

Mr. OATES. I did not understand that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] is recognized on the merits of the proposition, pending the decision of the point of order.

Mr. OATES. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will ask to have read from the Clerk's desk the portions which I have marked of a report which I made upon this bill at the present session of Congress, because it is as concise a statement of the leading purposes of this amendment as I can possibly make. There are additional arguments to be offered and a good many of them, but I ask that this be first read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Your committee have ascertained with reasonable certainty that certain noblemen of Europe—principally Englishmen—have acquired and now own, in the aggregate, about 21,000,000 acres of land within the United States. We have not sufficient information to state the quantity owned by the untitled aliens, nor is it so important, as it is generally held in smaller bodies. This alien nonresident ownership will, in the course of time, lead to a system of landlordism incompatible with the best interests and free institutions of the United States. The foundation for such a system is being laid broadly in the Western States and Territories. A considerable number of the emigrants annually arriving in this country are to become tenants and herdsmen on the vast possessions of these foreign lords under contracts made and entered into before they sail for our shores.

The avarice and enterprise of European capitalists have caused them to invest many millions in American railroad and land bonds, covering perhaps 100,000,000 acres, the greater part of which under foreclosure sales will most likely before many years become the property of these foreign bondholders in addition to their present princely possessions. It is thus manifest that if the present large alien ownership is an evil, of which we have no doubt, the probabilities of the near future still more imperatively demand legislation for its prevention. This aggressive foreign capital is not confined to lands it has purchased, but, overleaping its boundaries, has caused hundreds of miles of the public domain to be fenced up for the grazing of vast herds of cattle and set at defiance the rights of the honest but humble settler.

The policy of the Government heretofore toward aliens has been characterized by great liberality, and the different States of the Union, each acting for itself, have gone still further, upon the idea of the desirability of a rapid increase of population and wealth, and by their legislation have conferred upon aliens rights far beyond those they enjoyed by treaty stipulations, the common law, or the law of nations.

In England the people are divided into natives, or such as are born within the protection of the Crown; denizens, or such as are foreign-born, but who have obtained letters patent to make them English subjects; and aliens, or such as are born outside of the dominions of the Crown and have not taken such letters.

In this country a similar division is observable. Natives are those who are born under the protection of the flag of the United States and owe allegiance thereto in return for its protection. A denizen is one who was born without the jurisdiction and allegiance of the United States, but who has legally declared his intention to become a citizen thereof; and an alien is one who was foreign-born and does not owe allegiance to the United States, but to some other sovereignty.

The bill proposes to place the latter class of people under the disabilities of the civil law as to all future attempts to acquire lands in this country. In other words, the bill is a declaration against alien absentee landlordism.

The bill is simple and of easy comprehension. It declares all foreign-born persons who have not been naturalized incapable of taking the title to lands anywhere within the United States except a leasehold for not exceeding five years, and it has no retroactive, but a prospective operation. It places all persons alien to our Government under the disability to take real estate or immovables which the civil law imposed. By that law deeds of conveyance of immovable property were void on account of the absolute incapacity of the grantee if an alien, to take or hold the land.

The bill proposes, as a part of the foreign policy of this country, to operate only prospectively, and therefore not harshly to prevent absolutely the citizens or subjects of other nations, so long as they adhere to and retain their allegiance to other powers, from acquiring the ownership of American soil within the jurisdiction of the United States. We maintain that American soil should be owned exclusively by American citizens.

Perhaps objection may be made to the bill on the ground that its tendency will be to drive foreign capital from this country, which we do not admit. The right to be a mortgagee or beneficiary in a deed of trust pertains to an alien independently of an enabling act, but an amendment is proposed to give assurance on this point. The mortgages and land bonds held by aliens would not be materially impaired by the law proposed. They are deeds of trust, and can be foreclosed and the lands sold in default of payment by an alien holder as well as by a citizen. Neither can, according to law, buy at his own sale, because of the conflict of interest with duty, unless it is so stipulated in the contract; and this being known, can have no other effect upon future foreign investors in this class of securities than to make them a little more careful, and not to rely upon the prospect of ultimate ownership of the land mortgaged.

The bill does not stop at State lines, but under authority of that clause of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the sole and exclusive right "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States" overlaps them, and would, if enacted into a law, prevent any more such abuses as that of Mr. Scully, who resides in England and is a subject of the Queen, but owns 90,000 acres in the State of Illinois, occupied by hundreds of tenants, mostly ignorant foreigners, from whom he receives as rent $200,000 per annum and expends it in Europe. The Scheuley estate, consisting of about 2,000 acres, within the city limits of Pittsburgh and Allegheny, from the rents of which the Scheuleys, who are subjects of the British Queen, draw annually not less than $100,000, is another instance of alien landlordism in America. Numerous others could be cited. The Tenth Census shows that the United States has 570,000 tenant farmers, the largest number possessed by any nation in the world, notwithstanding our policy of giving homes to all natives, and foreigners who have declared their intention to become citizens, if they will but reside upon the land for five years.

With the natural increase in population, and the five hundred thousand foreigners who flock to our shores annually, and by competition are reducing the wages of labor, making the battle of life harder to win, how, a few years hence, to provide homes for our poor people is a problem for the American statesman to solve. The multiplication of the owners of the soil is a corresponding enlargement of the number of patriots, and every land-owner in this country should owe allegiance to the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope we shall have some agreement as to limiting debate on this bill; otherwise we shall not finish the bill to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What limit does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest ten minutes.

Mr. OATES. I hope the gentleman will not cut me off. I am in favor of his bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] merely to suggest a time when the debate shall close.

Mr. HOLMAN (to Mr. OATES). How much time do you want?

Mr. OATES. Seven or eight minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will fifteen minutes be sufficient?

Mr. WHEELER. Does that mean on the whole bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. On this proposition. I shall then seek to call the previous question on the bill and the pending amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that debate close in fifteen minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I object. This amendment ought not to pass without discussion.

Mr. DOCKERY. There is not any danger of its passing without discussion.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend section 1, line 2, by adding after the word "States" these words: "or who is not a resident of the United States and who has not in proper form declared his intention to become a citizen."

Mr. MCADOO. I am substantially in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES]. I had the honor of introducing a like measure in the Forty-eighth Congress.

I do not think we realize in the United States the full meaning of land ownership—the full meaning of the term "landlord." In olden times the man who was lord of the land was, by virtue of his lordship, the war lord; by virtue of owning and controlling the land he had his hand upon the destinies of the people.

I am utterly opposed to permitting men from foreign lands who are not in sympathy with our institutions, who are opposed, heart and soul, to republican government, to come here and acquire that which is the foundation of all our national prosperity—the land; for the men who own and control the land will, of necessity, direct the political destinies of the country whose land they own.

As I understand, the younger sons of English lords, cut off under the law of primogeniture from inheritance in the lands of their own country, have come here with small fortunes and acquired vast tracts of land in the West, especially in Colorado and some of the new Territories. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has incorporated in his report the startling exhibit which has been read, showing that these noblemen from various countries in Europe have come here and obtained possession of a quantity of land which is almost fabulous.

Gentlemen, unless this thing is checked, foreign landlordism with all the trains of evils which have followed such an institution in the older lands, with the serfdom and political subserviency which must follow, will become an established institution in the United States. I can scarcely have patience with the estimable gentlemen coming here from our Western country who, anxious, as they naturally should be, that our great Territories should be quickly built up as States and the land quickly occupied, are willing, in order that for the present they may find ready purchasers for these lands, to encourage this very vicious and dangerous system of alien ownership of lands.

Mr. LAIRD. We are not in favor of it.

Mr. RYAN (to Mr. MCADOO). How does your proposition differ from the existing law on this subject?

Mr. MCADOO. It is a little stronger.

Mr. RYAN. In what respect?

Mr. MCADOO. I will leave that to the gentleman from Alabama to answer. In reference to my amendment, I will say that it liberalizes somewhat the pending amendment by providing that a man who comes here and makes a declaration of intention to become a citizen may own land. I believe that the class of people of whom I have spoken will not come here and forswear their allegiance to the institutions and potentates to which they are attached in the old country. For instance, it is safe to say that an English nobleman will not go into an American court in Colorado or New Jersey and forswear his allegiance to the British Crown. If he is willing to do so, if he is ready to become a bona fide resident and citizen, then I look upon him as one who has been redeemed to the ranks of democracy, and I am perfectly willing he shall have a show with the rest of us.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, obtained the floor.

Mr. OATES rose.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] desires to proceed now, I will take the floor afterward.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to trespass upon the time of the House, if what I say is not interesting; but I would like to have a little more time than I can get under the rules; for on this proposition I could occupy the floor without much repetition for at least an hour. There is not only one, there are two or three very grave and important questions involved in the amendment. It is farther-reaching than some gentlemen conceive; and although it may fail now, mark my prediction, the time is not many years distant when the substance of this proposition will be adopted by the Congress of the United States.

Substantially the same measure as that which I now propose was introduced by me in the form of a bill in the Forty-eighth Congress; and in the Forty-ninth Congress the provision as to the power of aliens to acquire and own land in the Territories was adopted and became law.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Does the gentleman say the substance of this amendment was adopted as law?

Mr. OATES. The substance of the amendment in its application to the Territories was enacted as law in the Forty-ninth Congress, the bill having been originally introduced by me in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. RYAN. How does this measure differ from that already adopted?

Mr. OATES. It differs in this respect: Under this provision an alien can not acquire title to land within the States; that is all.

The bill to which I have referred does not remedy the evil intended to be reached, except very partially. I stated in the report read the aggregate of a portion, but not all, of the lands owned by the titled nobility of Europe, who, while not residing in this country, not caring a groat for it except for the money they can make out of it, own more than 21,000,000 acres of land in this country, and nearly all of it within the States.

The objection which has been raised to this proposition in committees which have heretofore considered it, comes up here now, which is a question of power. Some gentlemen do not believe that Congress has constitutional power to enact such a law. While I am an advocate for the observance of constitutional limitations, while I always seek to find in the terms of the Constitution or fairly deducible from it, the power for every measure I propose to vote for, I do not see any difficulty in recognizing this measure as constitutional. Although some good lawyers have expressed the opinion that Congress has no power to go to this extent, it is clear to my mind that Congress has the power.

Gentlemen should reflect for a moment that this proposed amendment does not operate upon any State or the right of any citizen of any State; it does not undertake to deprive any citizen of any right; it is to operate only as to the status of aliens—men who are not citizens of this country, who have no rights under this Government, except the common-law rights which general civilization extends in all Christian countries to subjects of other countries.

This simply fixes the status of an alien in this country in respect to his capacity for ownership of lands. Under the common law an alien could take title to lands, but as he had no inheritable blood the title, if it were allowed to remain by the sovereign power, died with him. His heirs could not inherit it.

The sovereign power, as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States many years ago in a case arising in the State of Virginia, has the right to denounce and forfeit a title which an alien acquires to land.

The difference between the common law and the civil law in this respect is that the civil law renders an alien incapable of taking and holding lands. Under that law if an alien were to attempt to acquire land in this country the title he got would be null and void. This proposes to enact the civil law. The amendment proposes to put the United States in this respect in line with the other nations of the world, because except by treaty or special enactment for a particular case nowhere can any of our citizens under any other Government acquire and own real estate.

This amendment allows aliens a leasehold of not exceeding five years. It allows them to hold property for legation and ministerial purposes. It also permits, in accordance with the common law, aliens to advance capital and secure debts by mortgage and deeds of trust in this country, and it gives them the right to foreclose and sell, but it does not give them the right to acquire title—a thing which they can not do under existing law, except by contract with the mortgagor.

Gentlemen, when you look into the indebtedness of these great railroad corporations, and especially the Pacific railroad companies, you will find that nearly all the mortgages are owned in Europe by aliens. If those mortgages are foreclosed and millions of acres are sold, the result will be that these lands will pass into the hands of these alien holders of the mortgages. I would not deprive them of any of their rights, but I certainly would not like to see these lands pass into the hands of aliens.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, rose.

Mr. OATES. I merely want to finish my sentence, and then I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Minnesota. I would not deprive these aliens of a single one of their rights, but at the same time if they should foreclose their mortgages and sell these millions of acres and become the purchasers, I do not wish to see them bring out here their ignorant hordes from Europe to settle upon these lands as their tenants, to the disadvantage and injury of our own people.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the gentleman from Alabama who has just taken his seat; and I hope this House will not overlook the purpose and effect of this amendment.

I am not in favor, Mr. Speaker, of aiding or permitting any foreign syndicates or any syndicates to obtain extensive tracts of land in this country. But this proposition will touch severely a class of immigrants in whose welfare I hope we all feel an interest, and who have added much to the prosperity of this country.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] denies to any foreigner landing on our shores the right to obtain title to or any interest in any real estate—except a lease for a term not exceeding five years—before he has become a citizen of the United States. And he can not become a citizen before he has been five years a resident in this country. I do not think that the country whose development has so largely depended on this class of people—a country that has taken so much pains to invite and encourage immigration—should adopt such a policy. It is best for this country and for them that those immigrants intending to become citizens of the United States and who have on oath declared their intention to become citizens, should become owners of real estate. Nothing so surely attaches any one to the institutions of a country, or so certainly interests him in its laws and in the preservation of good order, as the ownership of real property.

I agree to the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey—that it shall be a condition precedent to the acquisition of real property that they shall on oath declare their intention to become citizens; but beyond that I am not willing to go.

There came to this country from Europe last year nearly 500,000 people. They had reason to feel that they would be welcomed by us. This amendment would deny them the right for five years at least to even purchase a home to shelter themselves or their families, or the right to initiate proceedings to acquire title to that part of the public domain on which we invite them to settle. I think such a proposition, while it may, as said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], correspond to the precedents of European countries, is not American.

I am opposed, sir, utterly opposed, to such a proposition. The Western part of our country at the present time, and the same was true of the Eastern part of the country when it was newer, has a large percentage of its population who are foreign born and of many different nationalities, and no more peaceable, no more industrious, no better citizens are found among us. It would be to them an indignity and a wrong to show such distrust of their patriotism or intelligence as is implied by this amendment.

Mr. Speaker, when war broke out in this country, and I take every war since the settlement of the colonies until this time, there were no more gallant soldiers that marched under the banner of the Republic than our foreign-born citizens. I may safely say, and it is only due to them to say it, they have been as patriotic, as brave, and as gallant in all of our struggles as our own native-born citizens.

I remember well, sir, for history records it, that some entertaining the same feelings that this amendment would have us indorse have always been found in this country. I might instance the case of Thomas Addis Emmet. Driven from his own country for attempting to free it from the yoke of England, he fled to the United States, the hope and asylum of every lover of liberty. But, strange to say, he found here not only individuals, but a party that strove to deny him the right to earn a living by the practice of his profession before he had become a citizen of the United States. But they failed.

These natives of other countries who come here attracted by our free institutions and with the purpose of becoming American citizens have in peace and in war reflected credit on themselves and added to the greatness and wealth of this country. The few anarchists who have fled from their own country are not of this class, nor are they of the class who wish to acquire real estate or homes in this country. To show distrust of that liberty-loving, law-abiding class who have done so much for our country because a few outlaws have landed on our shores would, I submit, Mr. Speaker, not be worthy of us or creditable to us.

Mr. OATES. I hope my friend from Indiana will allow me to occupy five minutes additional time, as I perceive this amendment and my remarks have both been entirely misunderstood.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I will ask unanimous consent that the debate close in five minutes.

Mr. KERR. I object to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph close in five minutes.

Mr. KERR. It seems to me that such an important matter ought not to be settled in a five-minutes' debate. It is revolutionizing the entire policy of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. KERR. I only want two or three minutes myself.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, the time is getting late, and I will ask consent to close the debate in eight minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I shall make a motion to close the debate in ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's remedy is to move the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I give notice that I will in eight minutes' time make a motion to close the debate.

Mr. WHEELER. On this paragraph and the amendments.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I was apprehensive at the outset that the gentleman from Minnesota and others would misapprehend the character, nature, and scope, or, in other words, the extent and purpose to be accomplished by this amendment. My friend from Minnesota supposes that this is aimed at the foreigners, or is hostile to those who come from abroad to our shores.

No one, sir, has greater sympathy than myself for the crowded populations of the Old World, who flee to this country because of the difficulty of maintaining an existence and founding happy homes in their own native land. But, sir, however broad and philanthropic we may be, the time is coming when it will not do to legislate and act upon mere sympathy. The time is rapidly approaching when a further increase of population beyond that which arises from the natural growth of our own people will not be desirable.

Sir, whenever the time comes that it will be against the interests of the American people for the vast hordes of foreigners who are coming here year after year to be admitted into our country, you will find Congress enacting laws to restrict that immigration.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question here?

Mr. OATES. I will.

Mr. RYAN. I wish to know if under your amendment an alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States can make an entry upon the public lands?

Mr. OATES. I understand the amendment to be strictly in harmony with this bill which you are about to pass. It, I believe, provides that the patent can issue only to a citizen; and the law requires a residence of five years on the land before a patent can issue; indeed, before he can prove up his compliance with the requirements of the law which gives him a title. He can have no title until this is done.

Mr. RYAN. That is the bill in the absence of your amendment.

Mr. OATES. The homesteader does not acquire title until he has resided upon the lands five years; and there is nothing in this amendment which would prevent an alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen from entering upon a homestead and occupying it for five years, at which time he could perfect his naturalization and homestead proof; and having become a citizen he could take the title to his homestead. This bill permits aliens who have legally declared their intention to become naturalized to enter upon a homestead, but withholds the patent until citizenship is perfected. The amendment is, therefore, in harmony with the bill.

Mr. RYAN. That answers my inquiry.

[Mr. OATES withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman's purpose be, as I understand him, to exclude immigration to this country, he has well chosen his language. The amendment will tend to effect the purpose he has in view. But I trust this House will not be misled by the impression that the amendment strikes only titled lords. Where it strikes one titled lord it will strike ten thousand poor, industrious, honest, law-abiding men who wish to become good American citizens.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. A man can become naturalized in less than five years. He can settle on the public domain. He can not get his title until he has been there five years, just the time required for him to become naturalized. As soon as he is naturalized he is a citizen.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. What you say shows that a gentleman so intelligent on almost every point may be mistaken about our Western land laws and the mode of acquiring title under them.

A man who settles with a view to acquiring a homestead or pre-emption right, can not take a leasehold interest. He must settle there in good faith, complying with the laws of the United States, and thus initiating title. If he does not do that he is liable to be turned off any day and dispossessed. He can not initiate title which he can afterward perfect until after he has been there five years, if the gentleman's amendment passes.

Mr. OATES. Will my friend answer one question right there?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I beg pardon; I have but five minutes. I should be glad to yield to my friend, but my time is short and it is being rapidly used up, and so I would rather not be interrupted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as the class of persons for whom I speak is concerned, they represent ninety-nine one-hundredths of the immigrants to this country. The titled lords in number are not worth speaking of. They will do to hold up as a pretext for passing this bill, but they are so few as to be not worth discussion.

Mr. MCADOO. But one lord takes as much land as ten thousand immigrants.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Very well; if you are willing to cut off all the other parties who come here for the purpose of striking one lord, I never was so mistaken in a man in my life. I do not believe you mean it.

Mr. MCADOO. The amendment does not do it. Your amendment to the amendment does not. I am in favor of that. But the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama does prevent the acquisition or any right but a leasehold right for a term not exceeding five years.

Mr. OATES. Nor my amendment either?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I think it does.

Mr. MCADOO. I understand it does not.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I understand it does. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] in a manly manner avows his purpose to exclude immigration to this country.

Mr. OATES. I say that because I have introduced another bill to restrict it.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I think I do not misunderstand this bill. It merely says to those parties who come here to develop our country and become American citizens that they can not, as I say, initiate any proceedings by which to acquire title until they have become citizens, which would require at least five years. By that time the opportunity for their getting a homestead where they may have settled would have passed by.

I am not ready by implication to say to them that they shall be excluded from our shores as dangerous to our peace and detrimental to our prosperity. I am not in favor of the purpose of the amendment in any sense whatever. Those men who thus come here are among our best citizens. They add to our greatness and prosperity on the battlefield and in civil life. There is nothing in the history of the past that justifies us in anticipating danger from a continuance of the privileges which have been heretofore extended to them. Forbid the acquisition of titles to large tracts of land by wealthy foreigners if you will. Punish and exclude from the country anarchists if you will. All this I favor. But in the name of justice let us not punish or do injustice to peaceable, law-abiding citizens on account of the crimes of or the dangers to be apprehended from those other classes.

I have no time to discuss the constitutional question. But I wish to say that I do not think Congress has the constitutional power to make such a regulation as is proposed operative in the States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KERR, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. OATES addressed the Chair.

Mr. KERR was recognized.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] to yield to me to make a request.

Mr. KERR. I intend to occupy only two or three minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to make the request now.

Mr. KERR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is very manifest that although there are pending only two or three amendments to the bill there will not be enough time before five o'clock to finish the bill, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the session extend beyond five o'clock until the bill is completed.

Mr. REED. Suppose you ask an extension until half past five. You kept the House here until 11 o'clock last night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asks unanimous consent that this day's session be extended until the pending bill is completed.

Mr. BURROWS. I think that ought not to be done, after having been in continuous session for six hours. I object. I should prefer to take a recess.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn it adjourn to meet at 8 o'clock this evening, to proceed with the consideration of this bill, no other business to be transacted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I object.

Mr. KERR resumed the floor, but yielded to Mr. OATES.

Mr. OATES. I am satisfied from the remarks of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] that there are gentlemen here who do not begin to understand my position in reference to this amendment which I have offered, and as I can not obtain time to discuss it on the floor I ask leave now to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of this session, or thereabouts, I noticed the bill of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], and I was surprised at it. At the beginning of this debate I asked him to state what provision of the Federal Constitution authorized the General Government to regulate the transfer of title in the States. He has made no suggestion on that point; but I noticed that in his remarks he did step outside of a certain platform which was recently adopted. The platform says that no power exists in the General Government unless it is specifically granted.

In the gentleman's remarks he said that either there was a power granted in the Constitution to do what he proposes, or that it arose from necessity. I am glad to see the gentleman stepping under the broad doctrine of the old Whigs on that question. But, sir, in confirmation of what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] has said, I wish to say that I believe the States of this Government have ample power to prevent any class of their citizens from becoming oppressive or acquiring such control of land titles in their midst as will be injurious to the permanent prosperity of the community.

The States can regulate the laws of descent; they can provide absolutely, so far as I know, that all property shall descend in a particular direction, or even that it shall go to the State. There is no inhibition of that to my knowledge; if there is, let the gentleman point it out. I do not believe there is any danger to this country from men who come here from other countries, if when they come they are permitted to make contracts for the permanent ownership of a portion of the land of this country; but that is what the gentleman's bill seeks to prohibit.

If you say that when a man comes to this country he must remain a leaseholder for five years you put him in a fair position to become a public enemy; but let him, even the day he lands, be free to become an owner and you make him a friend of our institutions and a man who will ultimately become a citizen ready to fight for our Government in its direst extremity. Therefore, sir, I am opposed to the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask unanimous consent that the time of this session be extended half an hour beyond 5 o'clock, if that should be necessary for the completion of this bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are two or three small matters to which I want to call attention. It is suggested that there is an ambiguity in the language of the bill on page 19, line 26.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. What has become of my amendment and the gentleman's point of order on it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; I do not. The amendment is not germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted. Will the gentleman from Indiana please state his point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order is, that of the three propositions in the amendment neither one is germane to the subject-matter of the bill. The subject-matter of the bill is the regulation of the public domain, while all the propositions in the amendment go entirely beyond that. Of course this does not apply to the Territories, because as to them the law is already fixed. It can apply only to the States, and therefore has no application to the public domain.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). The Chair thinks that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, in so far as it seeks to control the future disposition of lands not now the property of the Government, and not the subject of legislation in this bill, is not germane. To that extent, therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Alabama having, in framing his amendment, gone beyond the public lands, the Chair is compelled to hold that the amendment is not in order. It would be competent, in the opinion of the Chair, to adopt a proviso of the kind suggested, applicable only to the public lands and their disposition; but waiving altogether the question of the power of Congress—a matter with which the Chair would have nothing to do—the Chair thinks it is not germane in a bill of this kind, dealing only with the public domain, to attempt to incorporate any provision not bearing distinctly upon the public lands and their disposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "law," in line 26 of section 27, the words "not in conflict with it;" so as to read:

This section shall not be construed as repealing any provision of law not in conflict with it, touching or concerning the protection of timber, etc.

I think this amendment hardly necessary, but I move it as a matter of abundant caution.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. The concluding language of this bill is:

All provisions of law in relation to swamp lands and other grants made by Congress to States and Territories shall remain in full force.

The word "grants" has relation to forfeited land grants and the like. I desire to offer, as a matter of precaution, though I think it hardly necessary, the following amendment to come in at the end of the bill:

The term "grants" in the foregoing sections shall not be construed as applying to grants to States to aid in the construction of railroads, wagon-roads, and canals.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAIRD. I desire to move an amendment to come in as an additional section.

Mr. McRAE. I would like to call up a section which was passed a moment ago, as I desire to move an amendment.

Mr. LAIRD. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. McRAE. As a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS], I offer the following amendment, to be added to section 26:

That the fees for entries and for final proof, when made before any other officer than the register and receiver, shall be as follows:
For each affidavit, 25 cents.
For each deposition of claimant or witness, when not prepared by the officer, 25 cents.
For each deposition of claimant or witness, prepared by the officer, $1.
Any officer demanding or receiving a greater sum for such service shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding $100.

Mr. RYAN. The original proposition limited the fee in cases of final proof to $3. I think it should not exceed that sum, as it may do under the gentleman's amendment, I believe.

Mr. McRAE. No, sir; the fee in such cases would not exceed $3. There would be the affidavits of two witnesses and the claimant; and $1 for each would make just $3.

I submit that the people ought to know just what they are required to pay in matters of this kind; and the officers ought to be controlled by a fixed rule so that there may be no dickering between the claimant and the officers. If the deposition is prepared by the officer, a fee of $1 is reasonable; if prepared by the attorney, a charge of 25 cents is fair and usual.

Mr. WEAVER. I suggest that the gentleman insert in his amendment, before the words "shall be punished," the words "upon conviction."

Mr. McRAE. Very well; I modify my amendment in that manner.

The question recurred on Mr. PETERS's amendment as modified; which was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding another section:
"That all persons who have heretofore settled upon the public land within the limits of forfeited railroad land grants whereon the railroad has not been constructed, and who have paid to the United States a sum in excess of the prices hereinbefore set out, shall have refunded to them such excess so paid, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay to the order of such persons such excess on the certificate of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. It is found by an examination of the bill, page 10, line 9, it is provided

Nor shall any payment be required therefor, except the payment of 25 cents per acre, to be paid when the application is filed.

And then we find on page 20:

And at the uniform price of $1.25 per acre when payment is required by law.

Throughout my country and New Mexico there are settlers who were compelled to pay because of the grant to the Texas Pacific Railroad $2.25 per acre for their lands. They were compelled to pay that price in consideration of the benefit they were to derive from the construction of the railroad. But no railroad has been constructed, and it seems to me only fair and just they should have their money returned to them to the extent at least of what was overpaid in view of the construction of the Texas Pacific Railroad. Many of these settlers are located far away from any railroad. These men, in the hope of receiving benefit from the railroad, paid $2.25 per acre, and my amendment will have the effect to return to them the amount which they have overpaid on account of the Texas and Pacific Railroad grant.

I know the objection will be raised to the adoption of any such provision in this bill that those who are in favor of the passage of the bill do not want to put as a brake upon it any such amendment as the one I have proposed. It is feared it may have some tendency to defeat the bill. It must be apparent to everybody that the object I have in view is merely to do justice to these men. I have been trying to get up a bill for their relief but have always failed to do so. It is now here, and I hope members of the House will adopt it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I regret the amendment is offered. It was subject to the point of order, if the point of order had been made in time. It has nothing to do with the public-lands system at all. It is a mere question whether this money should be refunded to these people or not. These men are in the same condition with hundreds and thousands of others in the Western country.

I have no right now to make the point of order against it, but I insist that the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall not press it too far. We have propositions in this bill which I do not think belong to it. They were put upon the bill against my judgment. I hope we will not add this amendment to the others. I ask gentlemen to confine themselves to the question of the public lands, and not go into these other matters.

The amendment of Mr. SMITH, of Arizona, was disagreed to.

Mr. LAIRD. I move the following amendment to come in as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 33. That after proof is made before the register and receiver of any land district in which land is situated, and a certificate is issued to the entryman, said certificate shall be considered prima facie evidence of ownership, and the burden of proof to vacate said entry shall rest upon the Government.
And no settler or his grantee or assignee on the public domain under the provisions of this act shall be deprived of his title to any land based upon a receiver's final receipt, except upon an open and public trial under and according to the forms of law relating to contest cases.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order on that amendment. We have already voted on this proposition, and I hope the gentleman will not insist upon it.

Mr. LAIRD. I must insist upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has already been voted upon.

Mr. LAIRD. I beg pardon; it is somewhat changed from the way it was presented before.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is the same practically. This bill is not to provide for the administration of the land system.

Mr. LAIRD. This is no more administrative than the amendment offered by myself and adopted here a few moments ago with the concurrence of the committee, and which relates to the administration of the Land Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, let us have a vote.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word in explanation of this amendment.

It is notorious that a system has prevailed in the General Land Office during the greater part of the last three years under which, after the granting of a final receipt to land by the United States local land officers, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, without notice or citation to the settler or his grantee or assignee, cancels such settler's final receipt. And this was commonly done by the Commissioner on the confidential report of a special agent, access to which was refused to the settler. He was condemned on private and privileged information without hearing, without a day in court.

A final receipt, in law, is title, and in the absence of fraud in its acquisition (shown affirmatively by the Government) the Government is estopped from going behind such receipt.

The trouble with the General Land Office is that they assume the fact to be proved, namely, the fraud, and punish the settler by depriving him of his vested right in the land acquired by compliance with the laws of the United States, thus violating the presumption of innocence running with every legal transaction, and also violating the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

In the absence of fraud, which can not be presumed or assumed, this final receipt is absolute title the same as a patent, and it is the duty of this Congress and this House to pass this amendment and protect honest settlers from this illegal invasion of their rights.

I ask that these gentlemen in the Land Office, if they want to wipe out the vested rights of my constituents and of the settlers of the West, shall first cite these men to a hearing and give them a legal day in court.

Mr. RYAN. That is but right.

Mr. LAIRD. It is only an act of justice.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not care to discuss the subject, and ask a vote. We have already voted it down once.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 27, noes 36.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are two sections of this bill which have been reserved—the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. BIGGS] in regard to the desert-land act, and also the feature in regard to coal, the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH]. I ask to go back now to these two provisions.

Mr. WHEELER. I have an amendment to offer before we leave this paragraph of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well.

The amendment of Mr. WHEELER was read, as follows:

Add as a new section:

"SEC. —. That after the 1st day of January, 1890, all the public lands of the United States which have not otherwise been disposed of prior to that date shall be subject to homestead entry and occupation under the provisions and limitations of the homestead laws."

Mr. WHEELER. That amendment makes the provision general. The intimation from several gentlemen that they would favor it if it was made general encourages me to offer the amendment in this form. When it was proposed to limit it to Alabama alone it had been suggested by one or more gentlemen that they did not desire its application to extend so as to include their States in its operation. I think this amendment should be adopted.

I think that after a certain period of years these lands that have not been disposed of ought to be so placed that the homesteader can go upon the lands and by an honest residence there acquire title and secure it for his home. The only objection urged is that frauds might be perpetrated. I say that it is in the power of the Government and of the officials of the Government to prevent fraud. The frauds which have been perpetrated heretofore have taught our officials the proper method of preventing them; and I believe if the amendment is adopted it will result in giving homes to many men who otherwise could not obtain them; and with the provisions now against fraud, I do not believe there will be any fraud under the homestead law.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to be persistent in this matter, but I do hope the House will adopt this amendment, so that after this period of three years our citizens may go to any part of our public domain in this broad land and obtain homes for themselves and families wherever these lands are to be found, and notwithstanding the lands they choose to select may have been classified as lands chiefly valuable for timber or mineral.

If the land they select is fit for a home, I say let any honest citizen of our country take it and make a home, and if there happens to be mineral under the soil let the man who has complied with the provisions of the homestead law have the benefit of it. If it proves to be valuable, let the profit accrue to him. It will not hurt this great Government.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is a very proper one. His first amendment, which applied simply to Alabama, I did not feel it proper to support, for the reason that it made an exception; but the present amendment embraces all the country, every State and Territory, and it seems to be quite appropriate to be adopted on a bill of this character.

The present bill, with all respect to the committee, is framed in a manner which rules against the poor man, the very men whom you pretend to favor. They pretend to say that they are to have the lands in preference to other people, that they are held for the benefit of the people, when in truth, if you examine the merits of the bill, you will see that the plan adopted rules against the poor and in favor of the rich man.

Why should these lands be reserved and classified as mineral lands any more than the agricultural lands? I can tell you that in my own State where there are agricultural lands there is a difference between them of from $5 to $10 and even to $15 an acre, according to the soil and location; and if it is true that it is right for the Government to classify the public lands into mineral and agricultural, then I hold that they should make the additional classification of the agricultural lands, if it is the business of the country to make money out of the public. Why should the Government begrudge you or me or any other man who goes West and has the fortune to locate upon a piece of land that happens, as afterwards ascertained, to have coal or mineral deposits in it? Surely, if we are fortunate enough to make a good selection the Government loses nothing. The whole purport of the bill we are told is intended for the benefit of poor people, but by the method adopted the poor man can not buy these lands, and can not locate upon mineral lands; and the result is that he is deprived of the opportunity of purchasing because the price is beyond his reach. The effect of such a provision as this is that the capitalist and the monopolist get possession of the mineral lands; and this same principle has brought about the monopolies of iron and coal about which we hear so much. The lands are practically reserved for them. If those lands are thrown open to the people to locate upon, then we will have less oppression from monopoly. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a single word before asking for a vote. I have a very kindly feeling for my colleague, and yet I must insist that before he makes another speech he shall read the bill under consideration. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I have read it, but I will read it again.

Mr. HOLMAN. When my friend has read the bill he will not make any such speech. Not having read the bill at all, my friend reaches a conclusion and makes a discovery that nobody else has reached or made. All that I insist on is that my friend shall read the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I will state to my colleague from Indiana that I have read the bill, and I will read it to him to convince him that he has that classification in it if he wants to hear it.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill is explicitly and wholly a homestead law.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Have not you $10 an acre on that land?

Mr. HOLMAN. Under that ten-dollar provision all our public lands are now subject to be sold and the cash turned into the Treasury. The object of this bill is to secure the public lands to actual settlers. You can not apply the homestead principle to mountains and forests where there is no land to cultivate. You can not give to a rich miner, such as I would suppose my friend to be representing if I did not know his integrity, a whole quarter-section in a rich mining district. My friend must read the bill. I disclaim any such purpose as he mentions. Every acre of land adapted for agricultural purposes is secured for the benefit of the actual settlers.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. WHEELER, and the Chair was in doubt as to the result.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and thereupon there were—ayes 11, noes 44.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House carry out its engagement and go back to the former section.

Mr. WHEELER. I have an amendment to submit to section 29.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to exempt the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws in relation to mineral lands," shall remain in full force and effect.

Mr. WHEELER. In 1883 a law was passed which exempted the mineral lands of Alabama from the operation of the mineral-land laws. It may be a question whether that law is repealed by this act or not, and I would like to get an expression upon this subject. I would like to have a direct declaration that the law of 1883 is not repealed. I simply ask that we remain where Congress has put us. Let the law stand in regard to Alabama as it was enacted on the 3d of March, 1883. If it was wise to exempt the lands of Alabama from the operation of the mineral laws in 1883 the same wisdom dictates that it should be done to-day. The lands are the same, and any change in the condition of that section of our country is a change which has increased and not diminished the necessity for the provision adopted then and asked for now. If, as some contend, the bill being considered does not repeal the law of March 3, 1883, it can do no harm for us to plainly make that declaration. I do not wish to detain the House. I do not wish to obstruct the passage of the bill. I want to have it passed, but I want to have it passed in such a way as to do the most good possible. I hope the House will let a declaration be made that the law of March 3, 1883, is not repealed by this act.

The question was put on the amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 36.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask that the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Wisconsin in regard to coal lands may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 by striking out all of said section after the word "provided," in the seventh line, and insert:

"Provided, however, That all the deposits of coal or iron on the lands of the United States are hereby reserved to the United States, and no future grant or patent from the United States shall be held to include such deposits: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the owner of any land acquired subject to the exceptions and reservations of this section from using such deposits for his own private use: Provided further, That neither the right of the Government of the United States to control and regulate the disposition of such deposits and working therein, nor the right of said Government to enter upon the land containing such deposits, either by its officers, agents, or lessees, shall ever be questioned; and the provisions of this section shall be expressed in all grants and patents for land hereafter disposed of by the United States."

To which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] proposes the following amendment:

After the words "United States," in the second line, insert the following: "Except on the land sold as coal or iron land."

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to submit a proposition to the House, and I do it with a good deal of diffidence. I feel very anxious that our coal lands shall, if possible, not be subject to any form of monopoly; yet certainly we can accomplish that purpose by legislation which will be in harmony with our land system and our practice heretofore in regard to the public domain. I wish to submit as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] the proposition which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That as to all lands hereafter sold the United States expressly reserves from sale all coal deposits therein; but, notwithstanding this express reservation, the purchaser of any such lands, his heirs, lessees, and assigns may mine and dispose of coal in any such land until such time as Congress in its discretion shall determine that the public good requires further legislation in relation thereto, and shall by general laws take the control of any such coal deposits for the purpose only of protecting the same from monopoly and securing the product thereof at reasonable prices to the people, and such reservation shall be expressed in all patents issued for land hereafter disposed of under the provisions of this act.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to discuss this proposition; and as time is becoming very precious to us, I ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken upon it as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and that the vote be taken without debate, because both sides of the House fully understand both propositions.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, as a part of my remarks I wish to have the Clerk read what I send to the desk, merely saying by way of preface that I am inclined to prefer the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following to the amendment of Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin, printed on page 5 of amendments:

"Provided, That the Government of the United States shall pay to the owner of the lands such damages as he may sustain on account of any use that may be made of his lands in operating any coal mines thereon; said damages to be ascertained and assessed under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President; and the Secretary of the Interior shall report to Congress at each session thereof all proceedings and findings done and had under the provisions of this section for such action as it may see proper to take thereon, and no claim or award under the provisions of this act shall be paid until Congress shall make an appropriation therefor.

"SEC. —. That whenever any deposits of coal are discovered in any lands hereafter disposed of by the United States, which deposits are by this act reserved to the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, with the approval of the President, may license any person or association of persons, citizens of the United States, to open up, develop, mine, remove, and dispose of any such coal: Provided, That no license shall continue for a period longer than six years, but the same may be renewed upon like conditions: And provided further, That no railroad or canal company or corporation, or other person, company, or corporation engaged in the business of common carriers, shall receive any license to mine such coal, or be permitted to have any interest, directly or indirectly, in the operation, conduct, or ownership of any coal mines under the provisions of this act: And provided further, That no person or association of persons shall receive a license, or be authorized to hold or operate, or be interested, directly or indirectly, in the holding or operation of more than 80 acres of such coal lands at any one time: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may at any time revoke and annul any license granted under the provisions of this act, for any violation of law or of the rules and regulations of the Department, by any licensee or those claiming under him."

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask for the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. Mr. Speaker, I have not very much to say about these amendments or about this bill, but I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that all things in relation to all men can not be limited and regulated in a public land bill. We are told in this bill that each individual shall be allowed to take 160 acres of land and each association 320 acres. No lawyer that I have ever seen, no lawyer who had ten clients proposing to go into an association would permit them to do so in order to take lands under this bill.

Any lawyer of common sense having ten clients who wished to form an association in the ownership of coal lands would first get 160 acres of land for each, and then having obtained the individual patents would form the association. Thus, those ten men, instead of owning 320 acres, would own 1,600 acres.

Mr. Speaker, the amendments just now offered are in the same line of foolishness. What boots it to insert in the bill provisos that patents shall not be granted for land having coal underneath it when the bill in its very terms provides that the surveyors and geologists shall classify this land, and that the agricultural land shall first be sold at $1.25 an acre? If some time or other coal be found below the surface of that land the man does not get his patent; the man who pays $10 an acre for coal lands does not get his patent. The bill does not say what it means.

Now let us legislate "straight." Let us say in our legislation what we mean. If we mean to give to a man 160 acres of coal land at $10 an acre, let him take it. If he should happen to find under it 2 feet of iron ore, as often happens in my county, why should he not be allowed the advantage? If he happens to find a piece of quartz with a little gold, why not let him take it? If he wants to go into partnership with a man who owns the next section, why should he not be allowed to do so?

If you pass such legislation as this, what is its effect? The honest settler who buys 160 acres of farming land, or the honest miner who buys 160 acres of coal land, is not safe in his title until the day when Gabriel's trump shall blow, because there may be underneath that land a grain of iron or a grain of gold.

Sir, you can not legislate against all the possibilities of the future. Legislate in honest, clear, common-sense terms, and let the future take care of itself. I have enough faith in the people to believe that when the time comes we can find whatever remedy we may require to restrain monopoly.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I now rise for the purpose of calling the previous question on the bill and pending amendments. But I yield a moment to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN], who desires to correct a clerical error.

Mr. HERMANN. The language of section 27, in lines 8, 9, and 10, is as follows:

And no owner, master, or consignee of any vessel, or owner, director, or agents, agent of any railroad, shall knowingly transport the same.

I move to amend by striking out the word "same" and inserting "such timber."

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I sent up an amendment which was read in my time, and which I desired to have voted upon. Under the operation of the previous question will there be a vote on that amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; upon all amendments which are pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] calls the previous question with the understanding that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri shall be considered as pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before insisting on the previous question I must yield a moment to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SEYMOUR], who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I move to amend by adding to section 11 the following:

Any portion of an abandoned military reservation located within the limits of an incorporated city may be set apart and reserved, by order of the President, for public purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now insist on the call for the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "United States," in the second line of the amendment, insert "except on the lands sold as coal or iron lands."

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is next on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. WEAVER. I ask that the substitute of the gentleman from Indiana be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That as to all lands hereafter sold the United States expressly reserves from sale all coal deposits therein; but notwithstanding this express reservation the purchaser of any such lands, his heirs, lessees, and assigns, may mine and dispose of coal in any such land until such time as Congress in its discretion shall determine that the public good requires further legislation in relation thereto, and shall by general laws take the control of any such coal deposits for the purpose only of protecting the same from monopoly and secure the product thereof at reasonable prices to the people; and such reservation shall be expressed in all patents issued for land hereafter disposed of under the provisions of this act.

Mr. RYAN. To what lands does this apply?

Mr. HOLMAN. It applies to all coal lands hereafter sold.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. I make a point of order on this amendment. The House having already passed those sections of the bill in which the classification of agricultural lands, coal lands, and mineral lands is provided for, I submit that this amendment is not in order, because it is in effect a reconsideration of those sections which have been passed.

Mr. WEAVER. The right to return to this proposition was expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCCULLOGH] that the section proposed to be amended was passed informally, to be recurred to for the purpose of offering amendments. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from Indiana for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. I am ready to accept that substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Still, it must be voted on.

The question being taken on agreeing to the substitute, there were—ayes 32, noes 22.

Mr. COBB. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair appoints as tellers Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. COBB.

Mr. COBB. I would like to say a word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question is pending.

Mr. COBB. I ask for just one minute to make a statement.

Mr. TILLMAN. Not unless time is given for reply.

Mr. COBB. I do not wish to enter into debate, but merely to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to allowing two minutes on each side?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. COBB. Here is a provision thrust into this bill by the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no; the committee did not authorize it.

Mr. COBB. Then it was suggested by the chairman of the committee?

Mr. HOLMAN. I offered it as a substitute.

Mr. WEAVER. I consider it an honor to anybody to have brought it forward.

Mr. COBB. If gentlemen will allow me I will go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. COBB. Coming as it does from the chairman of the committee, it has weight which it would not have if it came from anybody else. Here is an important measure put into this bill and hurried through without debate, affecting the policy of the Government in regard to public lands and seriously affecting the interests of our constituents. It is such a proposition I will not allow to pass without the presence of a quorum.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to have one minute for reply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. The only condition prescribed by the substitute is that the Federal Government shall reserve mineral coal until such time as it thinks fit to make regulations to dispose of them or permit them to be mined.

Mr. WEAVER. They have the right to mine them now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, purchasers have that right as the substitute reads.

Now, Mr. Speaker, four railroad companies have virtually absorbed control of every acre of the large anthracite coal fields in Pennsylvania. Jay Gould, I am told by responsible authority, has already acquired title to all the best coal lands in the State of Missouri, and that he is seeking such lands in Arkansas and Texas, as well as elsewhere in the West. The gentleman from Alabama knows, and if he does not I know the railroad corporations have virtually absorbed all the best bituminous coal lands.

Mr. McRAE. Under this bill they can only get 160 acres.

Mr. TILLMAN. Ah, but how easily can a railway corporation buy up each 160 acres that may be taken by a hundred or even a thousand purchasers, as has been done in Pennsylvania. All the lands of Pennsylvania were once public land belonging to the State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask by unanimous consent that the vote be first taken on the amendment of my friend from California [Mr. BIGGS] which was passed over yesterday.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I have another provision in reference to railroad corporations taking up coal lands, which was also passed over.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us take up and act upon the provision of the gentleman from California [Mr. BIGGS]. I ask that be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. OATES. There is a misunderstanding on the floor in regard to the meaning of the amendment. If I understood it aright I do not think it is objectionable.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask by unanimous consent that the vote be first taken on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. BIGGS].

Mr. FORD. I object, and I call for the regular order.

Mr. BIGGS. I want to make a statement. I believe I can expedite this business if permitted to proceed. [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only business in order is that the tellers shall resume their places.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The previous question having been ordered on the bill and amendment, will this not come up to-morrow as the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it will.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WEAVER. I have a suggestion to make that I think will meet the difficulty. Give us a yea-and-nay vote without debate immediately after the reading of the Journal in the morning on the adoption of the substitute of the gentleman from Indiana, and there will be no further objection as far as I am concerned, and I believe that will meet the approval of everybody.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is, of course, for the House to determine.

Mr. COBB. I will agree to that. I do not know but that I may agree to this after I have had time to consider it. But it has been thrust upon us here so that we have not had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman from Alabama agrees to my suggestion. I want a square vote on the proposition. That is all.

Mr. McKENNA. This a remarkable proposition. You sell your coal lands at $10 an acre and keep your coal. Did you ever know of any government doing such a thing as that?

Mr. WEAVER. Did you ever know of any government sustaining monopolies?

Mr. BIGGS. I want one minute to explain my amendment before it is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and the tellers will take their places.

Mr. WEAVER. Will the Chair submit my request to the House?

Mr. McCULLOGH. We can not order the yeas and nays here.

Mr. WEAVER. Why not? If we can have a yea-and-nay vote there will be no further objection.

Mr. McCULLOGH. Because you have got to call it by one-fifth of the members then present.

Mr. WEAVER. We can order the yeas and nays and then adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Regular order.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 36 members voting in favor thereof.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Now, a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should adjourn, would the call of the yeas and nays be the first thing in order after the reading of the Journal in the morning?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a matter for the then occupant of the chair to determine.

Mr. MACDONALD. I ask unanimous consent to extend the time until 6 o'clock to consider this matter.

Mr. McCREARY. I rise to the point of order that such a request is not in order at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. SPRINGER. Pending that, I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

Prayer by Rev. FREDERICK D. POWER, of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 30, 1888, a complete list of the laborers, skilled laborers, messengers, model-attendants, and other persons below the classified service who have been appointed or employed in the Interior Department in Washington since March 4, 1885; also a list of all persons who have been appointed in that Department in Washington since March 4, 1885, to any position, class, or grade, who have been since their appointment or are now employed in a position, class, or grade different from the one to which they were appointed, giving in detail the change in position, rank, or grade of employment in regard to each person separately; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Oakley, Kans., praying for the passage of what is known as the Outhwaite Union Pacific funding bill; which was referred to the Select Committee on the President's Message transmitting the Report of the Pacific Railway Commission.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Pierce, Nebr., praying for the passage of the so-called Outhwaite Union Pacific funding bill; which was referred to the Select Committee on the President's Message transmitting the Report of the Pacific Railway Commission.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present a memorial of the Omaha Board of Trade, remonstrating against the passage of "what is known as the Wilson bill." I take it this is a bill which has originated in the House of Representatives, providing for the imposition of double customs duties upon property transported through Canada. Perhaps the memorial should be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of John Thomas Vincent, late a private in Company G, First Regiment of Maryland Valtigeurs, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of the Randolph and Kansas City Bridge Company, praying for the passage of a bill for the construction of a ponton draw-span bridge across the Missouri River. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (H. R. 9611) to authorize the Macon, Tuscaloosa and Birmingham Railroad Company to build bridges across the Black Warrior River and the Tombigbee River, in Alabama; and

A bill (H. R. 5095) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Ocmulgee River, in the State of Georgia, and for other purposes.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7749) to authorize the building of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Wabasha, Minn., to report it adversely, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. VEST. I am also instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2625) authorizing the erection of a bridge across the Missouri River at Ponca, Nebr., to report it adversely, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. These bridge bills come so much as a matter of course that I hope the Senator from Missouri will excuse me if I ask the reason for the adverse report.

Mr. VEST. The difficulty in that case is that there is no corporation, but simply an association of a number of individuals, and whether it is even an association does not appear. The rule of our committee is not to give permission to build a bridge across a navigable stream simply to a collection of individuals. Nobody is responsible in such a case, and they may sell out from day to day, so that we do not know who has the authority at last.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand that has been the rule of the committee, and certainly no exception can be taken to that practice; but I understand that there is in the hands of the committee a Senate bill granting the right to build a bridge at the same locality, which is not subject to the objection stated by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. I beg the Senator's pardon; the very same objection applies to that bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. Is there no corporation stated in it?

Mr. VEST. There is no corporation; and I call the attention of the Senator who offered it—I think it was the Senator's colleague—to the fact that the defect exists in that bill also. In the mean time the House bill comes before us in the same condition and subject to the same objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. We will try to remedy that difficulty before the session closes.

Mr. VEST. That is all the trouble. I did not go any further with the bill, because that is a rule we established after long experience, and that caused the adverse report.

I beg leave to state to the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], as he makes a side remark in regard to it, that it is not a question of right at all. We admit the right, but we found out in one or two instances, when we gave that right simply to individuals, that they would sell out, and there was nobody amenable to the power of Congress if an alteration had to be made in the bridge. As a matter of course, Congress could not hunt up Mr. Smith, Mr. Jones, and Mr. Brown, or their successors or assigns, through the country and serve writs upon them if the bridge should become a nuisance and be an obstruction to navigation. Therefore we have adopted the rule that there must be some corporation which is amenable to the laws of Congress and to its jurisdiction.

Mr. CALL. I did not propose to take any part in this discussion. I happened to make a side remark which I still maintain is a very correct one, and which the Senator from Missouri has in no respect answered. I understand the objection he makes to this bill on the part of the committee is that the grantee of this franchise is not a corporation, and that the right to build a bridge was denied because it was not an artificial person, the assumption being that certain peculiar rights attach to an artificial person which as a matter of public policy should be favored so much as to refuse the grant of a public franchise to a natural person or an association of natural persons, and to require them to become an artificial person incorporated by law. I know of no difference between the rights which can be given by law to a corporation and those which can be given to a natural person; they are the same in their responsibility and subjection to law, in theory at least, and in fact the law is much more easily enforced against natural than artificial persons.

Mr. VEST. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not make any such statement. I do not claim that there are any peculiar rights. I simply say, as a question of expediency and policy, that the right ought not to be given to a lot of individuals. We have found that out by experience.

Mr. CALL. The Senator's argument demands it, and necessarily demands it; I speak not of what he individually claims. A corporation is nothing but a person, an artificial person, and differs in no respect in its rights nor in its powers except in the right of succession.

Mr. VEST. No lawyer disputes that. That is not the question at all.

Mr. CALL. But the Senator's argument disputes it.

Mr. VEST. I beg the Senator's pardon; my argument does not. I simply say that Congress under the decision of the Supreme Court has the unquestionable right to remove any bridge which turns out to be an obstruction to navigation. In order to do that it must serve notice upon the persons to whom that right has been given, either by a State or by Congress itself. In one instance, in the State of Illinois, this right was granted to a number of individuals. It was afterwards found necessary to serve notice upon them, which is just and proper in all such cases, that the bridge must be altered or removed, because it had been found to be a nuisance and obstruction to navigation. We found that the persons to whom the right had been originally given had sold out, and it became in that case impossible to ascertain who were the lawful owners of the bridge. If it had been a corporation no such difficulty would have existed. If it had been an artificial person we could easily have served notice upon it, or if it had sold, on its assigns. That is the whole point in the case.

Mr. PADDOCK and Mr. CALL addressed the Chair.

Mr. VEST. I suggest that we can take up this question when the bridge bills come up. I want to finish my reports from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL. I propose to make an observation.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Florida wants to discuss the question he will have ample opportunity hereafter.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor, and has been recognized to make reports from a committee. Does he yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understood the Senator from Missouri to refer to the fact that I had introduced a similar bill.

Mr. VEST. I do not remember who introduced it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not remember to have introduced such a bill.

Mr. VEST. Then I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. PADDOCK. In reference to the bill just reported, I wish to say that it can be very easily corrected.

Mr. VEST. I suppose so. I have stated the only trouble.

Mr. PADDOCK. I agree fully with the Senator in his views as to the framework of the bill. Probably it had better go to the Calendar.

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire to have the bill placed on the Calendar with the adverse report?

Mr. PADDOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. It can be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1701) authorizing the construction of a high wagon-bridge across the Missouri River at or near Sioux City, Iowa, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9587) granting a pension to Louise F. D. Hoit, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 362) to increase the pension of Charles W. Sanborn, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I report back from the Committee on Foreign Relations the bill (S. 343) for the encouragement of closer commercial relationship, and in the interest of and the perpetuation of peace between the United States and the Republics of Mexico and Central and South America and the Empire of Brazil, and I ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, the material provisions of the bill having been already incorporated in a bill that is now a law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill if there be no objection.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 3537) granting a pension to Cullen W. Green;

A bill (H. R. 4762) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Howard;

A bill (H. R. 6603) to grant a pension to the minor children of Levi M. Hunter, deceased; and

A bill (H. R. 8704) granting a pension to Julia Bryan, late nurse at Jeffersonville Hospital.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 707) providing for the purchase of a site and the construction of a wharf in Astoria, Oregon, for the use of the Light-House Department, heretofore reported.

He also, from the same committee, submitted a report to accompany a bill (S. 2778) making an appropriation for the purchase of a site and the construction of a light-house on the headlands near the mouth of the Umpqua River, in the State of Oregon, heretofore reported.

CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGES.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1524) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Tennessee River between Bridgeport and Sheffield, Ala., to report it with the recommendation that the Senate concur in the first and non-concur in the second amendment of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first House amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 20, after the word "bridge," the House of Representatives inserted the following:

And equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph companies.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment of the House of Representatives was, on page 3, at the end of line 3, to add:

And if said bridge shall not be finished within two years from the passage of this act, the rights and privileges hereby granted shall be null and void.

Mr. VEST. That same provision, I will state, is found in the bill as passed by the Senate. Therefore there is no necessity for the amendment. I think it was an oversight.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses?

Mr. VEST. I move that a conference be requested.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. VEST, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. DOLPH were appointed.

Mr. VEST. I am also instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1626) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Caney Fork River, between Rock Island and Carthage, in Tennessee, to report in favor of concurring in the first and non-concurring in the second amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the House of Representatives will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 20, after the word "bridge," the House of Representatives inserted:

And equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph companies.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the House of Representatives will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, at the end of line 28, the House of Representatives added the following:

And if said bridge shall not be finished within two years from the passage of this act, the rights and privileges hereby granted shall be null and void.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest to add to the amendment of the committee to the first paragraph, after the word "companies," the words "and the United States," so that if the United States should ever have a telegraph we should have the right to use the bridge for telegraph purposes.

Mr. VEST. That same provision is in the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is in the bill already?

Mr. VEST. Yes, in another portion of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right then.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. VEST, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. DOLPH were appointed.

Mr. VEST. I am also instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back a number of Senate bills to which there were formal amendments made by the House of Representatives, with the recommendation that the Senate concur in the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be severally reported by their titles and the amendments of the House of Representatives considered, if there be no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 322) to authorize the Southwest Arkansas and Indian Territory Railroad to build a bridge across the Ouachita River, in Arkansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the House of Representatives will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 15, after the word "bridge," insert:

And equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph companies.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The House of Representatives inserted as new sections the following:

SEC. 4. That the bridge hereby authorized to be constructed may be used by any other railroad company desiring to cross the Ouachita River at the point where said bridge is built. The amount of compensation to be paid the corporation controlling said bridge shall be fixed by the parties; and in the event of their being unable to agree on the amount, the Secretary of War shall establish such rate of compensation. Mr. MANDERSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3231) to provide for the construction of a railroad from Sturgis, Lawrence County, Dakota Territory, to some point on the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad, in Wyoming Territory, to the west of the Black Hills; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 3232) granting a pension to Adam Velten; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 3233) for the relief of James H. Hamilton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3234) to provide for writs of error to the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas in certain cases; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. In presenting this bill I desire to call the especial attention of the Committee on the Judiciary to the wrong which the bill is designed to remedy.

The district court of the United States sitting at Fort Smith has jurisdiction of a large extent of the Indian country. It is almost constantly in session and tries a great number of capital felonies at every term. Scarcely a term of that court passes without the conviction in capital cases of from half a dozen to a dozen men. The court being situated in the western part of the State of Arkansas, just on the line of the Indian country, it is not easily accessible to the circuit judge for that circuit, and the statutes provide that the district judge shall sit with circuit-court powers. The result is that in all capital cases where numbers of men are tried for their lives and convicted and executed, there is no appeal; there is no other court authorized to examine the trials and to correct any errors of law which may occur.

This is an anomaly in our judicial system which, it seems to me, the commonest principles of humanity demand should be changed in some way. If Chief-Justice Marshall himself could rise from the dead and preside in the district court, I for one would believe that any American citizen brought before that court, tried for his life, and convicted of a capital felony, if he thought he had suffered wrong at the hands of the court, ought to have the right to have the proceeding reviewed.

This state of things, I confess, I do not know whether the bill I have presented will remedy in a proper way; but I hope that the able lawyers who constitute the Judiciary Committee, after their attention has been called to this wrong, if it exists, if the bill is not a proper one, will frame a bill and report it to the Senate, providing some sort of remedy for what seems to be an outrageous wrong.

Mr. VEST. Bills have been reported from the Judiciary Committee for the establishment of courts in the Indian Territory and doing away with courts having outside criminal jurisdiction. Until those bills are disposed of and the policy of the Government in regard to that Territory as to judicial functions is settled, very little can be done in the direction suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

I agree with him entirely, however, omitting any discussion on the other bills, that some appellate jurisdiction should be provided. It is not using language too strong to say that it is a shame and outrage upon our civilization that human beings are found by the half dozen—not one; that attracts no attention at Fort Smith now, but six at a time—under the judgment of a single man, with the verdict of a jury not of the vicinage, but of a State outside of the Territory where these people live, and there is no appeal from that decision.

Whilst the laws of the United States give appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court as to matters of property over a certain amount, here, where the lives of human beings are at stake, for years men have been executed without any right to ask the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States whether it be judicial murder or not.

I agree fully with the Senator from Arkansas, but until these other matters are disposed of it is hardly possible that we shall arrive at any conclusion as to the present bill.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I wish to have the bill referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I did not hear the concluding sentence of the Senator from Missouri, but I do not understand that he objected to the reference of the bill.

Mr. VEST. Not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 3235) granting an increase of pension to George L. Warren; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to lay aside the pending order, that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the committee will be acted on as they are reached in the reading of the bill, unless objection be made.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, after line 15, to insert:

For commencing the construction of a breakwater from Mount Desert to Porcupine Island, Maine, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 23, after the words "Back Cove," to insert "Portland Harbor;" and in line 24, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Mr. FRYE. In line 34, in the clause, "Improving harbor at Burlington, Vt.: Continuing improvement, $25,000," the committee have instructed me to offer an amendment increasing that amount to $40,000, striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "forty."

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that we act upon the committee amendments as they appear in print, and he can make a memorandum of and move afterwards other amendments.

Mr. FRYE. There are only four throughout the whole bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall not object to any course the Senator proposes, but I think what I have suggested would be the better way.

Mr. FRYE. As there are only four such amendments in the whole bill I thought it better to suggest them as they were reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Maine will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 34, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Burlington, Vt.: Continuing improvement, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, after line 34, to insert:

Improving the channel between the islands of North Hero and South Hero, Lake Champlain, Vermont, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the clause appropriating $125,000 for improving the harbor of Boston, Mass., in line 44.

Mr. FRYE. The committee instruct me to move to add at the end of line 44 the following words:

And so much thereof as may be necessary may be expended in extending the sea-wall at Gallup's Island.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 92, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" in line 93, after the word "harbor," to strike out "and;" and in line 94, after the word "breakwater," to insert "and $5,000 for removing sand-bar at entrance of harbor;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Block Island, Rhode Island: Continuing improvement, $15,000; of which sum $6,000 are for inner harbor, $4,000 for breakwater, and $5,000 for removing sand-bar at entrance of harbor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 108, after the word "breakwater," to insert "and the Secretary of War is authorized, in his discretion, to expend any portion of said sum in commencing its construction;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving breakwater at New Haven, Conn.: Continuing improvement, $75,000; and the Chief of Engineers may, if deemed necessary, relocate the western breakwater; and the Secretary of War is authorized, in his discretion, to expend any portion of said sum in commencing its construction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 114, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "twenty-eight;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "$25,000 of which shall be expended in dredging and deepening the channel in the lower harbor up to Wilson's Point;" so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 128, after "New York," to strike out "continuing" and insert "to complete;" and in line 129, after the word "improvement," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "ninety-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Buttermilk Channel, N. Y.: To complete improvement, $95,000.

Mr. EVARTS. In regard to this item, will the chairman of the committee allow me to ask, where is the propriety of reducing the House appropriation of $100,000 down to $95,000?

Mr. FRYE. The report of the Chief of Engineers shows that in order to complete the entire improvement $95,000 are required. We can not properly go beyond that in the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. EVARTS. I would suggest, as no more will be expended than is required, that it is hardly worth while to make this amendment when perhaps the $5,000 may be wanted and necessary in some further consideration of the subject.

Mr. FRYE. As the Engineer Department always makes an allowance of 15 to 20 per cent. for contingencies, there can not be any question about the $95,000 completing the work, and the bill would not look exactly right to have an increase over and above the entire amount that the Chief of Engineers says will be necessary.

Mr. EVARTS. That might be if the completion was certain for the amount, but I do not suppose it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, to strike out lines 131 and 132, as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 153, after the word "dollars," to insert:

And the engineer in charge, with the approval of the Secretary of War, may use such part of this appropriation for dredging and deepening the channel and harbor as he may deem proper.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Raritan Bay, New Jersey: Continuing improvement, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 216, after the word "them," to insert "and the shoals adjacent thereto," and in line 219, before the words "hundred and fifty thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "five;" so as to read:

Improving the harbor of Philadelphia: For the removal of Smith's Island and Windmill Island, in the State of Pennsylvania, and Petty's Island, in the State of New Jersey, or such parts of them and the shoals adjacent thereto as may be required, and for the improvement of the harbor between the cities of Philadelphia, Pa., and Camden, N. J., $550,000.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the chairman of the committee which of the islands are to be removed, Smith's Island or Windmill Island, and what is the estimate of the cost of purchasing them?

Mr. FRYE. The cost of purchasing the islands will probably be, as the evidence appeared, about $600,000, and the cost of the entire improvement, I think my recollection is, about two and a half million dollars.

Mr. REAGAN. It seems to me that this item deserves some consideration before it is adopted by the Senate. There is ample room in front of Philadelphia for the shipping there. These islands are natural islands, and have been there always. We should understand what we are to do before we enter on a work to cost millions of dollars. I think the committee ought to state to the Senate what the probable cost of this will be and what the necessity of it is. There is ample room for navigation there now, I believe.

It is true that these islands lie between the shore on the Philadelphia side and the shore on the New Jersey side; but there are navigable pathways across there to any depth of water that is needed. Additional pathways may be made by dredging, if necessary; but I do not understand that we should enter carelessly and indifferently on a work of this kind, which seems to me more a work of fancy than of real necessity, at an expense of millions of dollars.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator is mistaken in supposing that in the harbor of Philadelphia there is ample room. With the present size of the ships used in commerce there is no room even for a ship to turn. The basin there is somewhat in the shape of a horseshoe, and the current is very sharp and presses in around the inner ring of this horseshoe, the wharves being around the ring. There is great depth of water near those wharves, but on account of that great depth of water they extend now as far out as they can. These islands occupy a distance in length of about 130 feet, and there are shoals both below and above the islands. For a distance of a half mile below Windmill Island there is less than 12 feet of water. I read from the committee's report:

These two islands, with the adjacent shoals, thus practically form a continuous obstruction in the river opposite the centers of the water fronts in both Philadelphia and Camden, extending 1¼ miles, if we consider only the portions of the shoals having less than 6 feet of water, or 2 miles if we include all of the shoals covered with less than 12 feet. The width of even the 12-foot channel between this obstruction and the heads of the Philadelphia wharves, for 1¼ miles, is from 750 to 1,000 feet, and the wharves can only be extended by diminishing this width, already too small. The greatest length of these docks is but 260 feet, while, as is well known, the larger ocean steamships are much longer. The part of the river on the Camden side of the islands is almost useless as a portion of the harbor, as it is thus so thoroughly cut off from the Philadelphia side.

I desire to say to the Senator from Texas that in the mind of the committee there was not the slightest question whatever about the propriety of the removal of these shoals and of these islands. I did not give the Senator the cost correctly. The cost is probably about $3,500,000 instead of $2,500,000 as I stated.

The only question with the committee was as to the propriety of Congress purchasing the islands which it is proposed to remove. The proposition was made before the committee that Congress appropriate $300,000 towards the purchase of the islands, and I suppose the people of Philadelphia will furnish the rest. There was a discussion in relation to it in the committee. The chairman of the committee is free to say that he was opposed to appropriating any money for the purchase of the islands, believing that Philadelphia could purchase them itself instead of the United States, but the large majority were favorable to the appropriation of $300,000 towards the purchase of the islands.

As to improving the harbor of Philadelphia, one of the greatest cities in the United States, and bringing into use the chances for docks on the Camden side as well as the opportunity of extending the wharves on the Philadelphia side, there can not be any possible question even though it should cost $5,000,000. The committee was not deterred in relation to that at all.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I want to supplement what has been stated by the Senator from Maine. I voted for this amendment in the committee. I coincide with the general views of the Senator from Texas. I believe in appropriations for improvements of national importance. If there are in the river and harbor bill any of a different character, that is an evil against which we have never found a remedy; but this appropriation is eminently a national one. The commerce there is second only to that which goes into the port of New York, and while it appeared to the engineers that the cost will be $3,500,000, it is not by any means an exorbitant appropriation. If my friend from Texas had paid the attention to this amendment that it became our duty upon the Committee on Commerce to give, he would find that the appropriation is just and proper. The engineers state that—

These islands, with their dependent shoals, besides being obstructions to the cross traffic between Philadelphia and Camden, practically reduce the width of the Delaware opposite them on the Philadelphia side to about 750 feet.

The whole argument in a nutshell, without reading in full, is this:

Smith's and Windmill Islands and the adjacent shoals should be removed, so as to give a 26-foot channel, about 1,000 feet wide, alongside the revised Philadelphia wharf-line, from Kaighn's Point to the foot of Petty's Island. If, in the progress of the work, it is found a wider deep channel can be maintained, it may ultimately be advisable to increase the 26-foot channel to 1,500 feet width.

To-day the commerce of the city of Camden is almost entirely cut off by the condition of the river, and it is one of the most promising of the Eastern cities. The commerce between Philadelphia and Camden is by no means inconsiderable; and in addition to that there is all the commerce of the Delaware River reduced now to this 750-foot channel, and that diminishing from year to year. This is, I said, one of the most important improvements in this whole bill, and there was nothing in it which commended itself more to my judgment in the whole investigation we made in regard to this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I am certainly always in favor of the most liberal appropriations for such national works as the improvement of the Delaware River and the facilitation of the commerce of Philadelphia. I know about the matter from having personally examined the river there.

It seems to me in regard to the objection which is urged, that large vessels can not conveniently turn between these islands and the Pennsylvania shore, that it would have been much cheaper to obviate that by dredging the river above or below the islands and by dredging a channel on the New Jersey side of the islands, if it is desirable to have an additional channel on that side. It may be necessary to do that in order to give ample facilities there, but I do not like to support a measure which looks to me more like a very large job for the owners of these islands than a work for the benefit of commerce. Certainly it would be cheaper to dredge the channel of the river than to remove the islands and then dredge under them. It seems to me we had better adopt the plan of improving the river than of removing land to get water beneath where the land now stands. Why not dredge on either side of the islands and thus give room enough for ships to turn?

Mr. VEST. I will say in answer to my friend from Texas that we of course depend on the judgment of the engineers. They recommend that these islands be removed. As a matter of course if the Senator from Texas has personal knowledge of the matters suggested by them which lead his judgment to a different conclusion, I have nothing to say; but we had before us what I commend to the attention of my friend, on page 30 of the report of the committee, the conclusion come to by the Engineer Bureau, and, as the chairman of the committee has properly remarked, the only question in our minds was as to the purchase of the islands. Some of the committee thought the city of Philadelphia ought to purchase them. I came to the conclusion that the same principle ought to apply to a city as to a hamlet; that if this improvement was national the Government ought to pay for it; and because Philadelphia was the second city in the Union we had no right to say that she should buy these islands and present them to the Government for the purpose of having control of them.

We were unanimous in regard to the importance of this improvement. The evidence was absolutely conclusive beyond all reasonable doubt that this improvement ought to be made. Three million five hundred thousand dollars is a bagatelle compared with the enormous commerce to be moved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 220, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended until the title to the lands forming said islands shall be acquired and vested in the United States without charge to the latter.

And insert:

Of which sum $300,000 may be expended for the purchase of said islands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 235, after the word "improvement," to insert "and widening channel to 600 feet;" and before the word "hundred," in line 236, to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Baltimore, Md.: Continuing improvement and widening channel to 600 feet, $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 245, after the word "improvement," to strike out "between Lambert's Point and Fort Norfolk, $10,000; and;" and in line 246, after the words "one hundred and," to strike out "eight" and insert "nine;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving approach to Norfolk Harbor and the United States navy-yard at Norfolk, Va.: Continuing improvement, the balance of $109,000 of former appropriations made under this head and available July 1, 1887, is hereby authorized to be expended according to the modified plan of the engineer in charge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 261, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which $5,000 may be expended on Mount Pleasant shore of inner harbor of Charleston, S. C.;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Charleston, including Sullivan's Island, South Carolina: Continuing improvements, $350,000, of which $5,000 may be expended on Mount Pleasant shore of inner harbor of Charleston, S. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 265, after the word "dollars," to strike out "of which $5,000 may be expended on Mount Pleasant shore of inner harbor of Charleston, S. C.;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Georgetown, S. C.: Continuing improvement, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, to strike out lines 268 and 269, as follows:

Improving Winyaw Bay, South Carolina: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senate will non-concur in that amendment. No reason has been assigned for the amendment proposed by the Senate Committee on Commerce, and I do not think that a satisfactory one can be given. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. The reasons which actuated the committee in moving this amendment are briefly these: The project for the improvement of Winyaw Bay, as appears by the survey of the engineer and by the recommendation made by him, will probably cost $2,500,000. That is at any rate the project which seems to be the favorite one of the Engineer Department. There are one or two other projects, one which would cost $800,000 and the other which would cost over a million, which I recollect seeing, but the favorite one seems to be the one which would cost $2,500,000. That I think was the report of Captain Bixby.

While the committee see the importance of the improvement at this point and admit it, they believe that the project should be passed upon by a competent board of engineers of five, and then by the Chief of Engineers, before Congress should by an appropriation of this kind adopt the project itself. That was what actuated the committee in moving to strike out the appropriation and inserting in its place a provision for a board.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very sorry if the Senate should adopt the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce. This sum of $100,000 was inserted in the bill by the House committee after the most thorough and exhaustive examination of this subject. There can be no doubt that the War Department recommended the appropriation suggested by the House of Representatives. Some years back a survey was made of the bar across Winyaw Bay, and the engineers then recommended an appropriation, and Congress made an appropriation in 1886, but it turned out that it was too small and too insignificant to be expended by the War Department, and but a very small part of the sum of eighteen thousand and odd dollars was used.

The Senator from Maine remembers that the Senate committee cut down the appropriation for rivers and harbors by 25 per cent. that year, which reduced the $25,000 in the House bill to eighteen thousand and some odd dollars, so that the Engineer Bureau did not feel authorized to expend the eighteen thousand and odd dollars, as it was insufficient for the purpose. That amount is still subject to this improvement. So the War Department passed upon this improvement several years ago. Captain Bixby has again and again and again recommended an appropriation for the improvement of Winyaw Bay, and his recommendation has been indorsed by Colonel Craighill, who has charge of that district, and Colonel Craighill's recommendations have been indorsed by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War. There is, perhaps, one fact which accounts for the opposition of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

Here is what Captain Bixby says in regard to it:

The submitted project of 1885 proposed to secure from 12 to 20 feet depth of water over the Winyaw Bay bar by a suitable contraction of the entrance by means of dikes. It recommended at least $300,000 for the construction of stone dikes across the sloughs and along the inner edges of the bars, so as to gradually stop all outflow except through the main bar entrances.

It was recommended in July, 1885, that the improvement be extended to a total amount of $880,000 if necessary, to be appropriated in three yearly installments of $300,000, $180,000, and $400,000, respectively. Of this amount it is now estimated that $300,000 can be profitably spent before the end of the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1887, in constructing a suitable heavy stone dike about 5,000 feet long, rising to 2 feet above low water and extending from the southern part of North Island in a general southerly direction completely across the nearest slough; that this single dike will probably produce at one or both of the remaining bar entrances a depth of 10.5 feet at low water, of great immediate advantage to the commerce; that two additional appropriations of $180,000 and $400,000 will probably complete the proposed improvement by securing the desired depth of at least 12 feet at low water upon one or both entrances.

Then he says this improvement may be made "at a probable cost of $300,000 for 10 feet depth, $880,000 for 12 feet depth, $2,500,000 for 15 to 20 feet depth on the bar at low water." It is in that way that the confusion has arisen, I dare say, in the mind of the Senator from Maine. If we spend $300,000 we get 10 feet of water; if we spend $880,000 we get 12 feet; if we spend $2,500,000 we get 15 to 20 feet. In my judgment there can be no sort of doubt about the propriety of this appropriation.

The Winyaw Bay and the Santee River, which empties into the ocean a very short distance from Winyaw Bay, are the outlet for the streams of twenty-seven of the thirty-three counties of South Carolina. The Great Pee Dee, the Little Pee Dee, the Lynch, the Black, and the Sampit Rivers, all of them navigable for quite a distance, terminate at Winyaw Bay, and the Broad River, the Saluda River, the Congeree, and the Wateree form the Santee, and that terminates very near the Winyaw Bay. The Santee River has been connected with the Winyaw Bay by what is known as Mosquito Creek Canal, so that really this is the most important location that I know of on the Atlantic coast for improvement.

Now, I wish to read a letter from General Alexander, the president of the Georgia Central Railroad Company, who lives in the neighborhood of Georgetown, and is therefore competent to speak as to this improvement. This letter is addressed to me, and is dated June 1:

SAVANNAH, GA., June 1, 1888.

DEAR GENERAL: I am quite interested in seeing the appropriation for Winyaw Bay bar restored to the river and harbor bill. I have written on the subject to Senators FRYE, JONES, of Nevada, and Governor BROWN. I wish to say to you officially, as representing the Ocean Steamship Company of Savannah, and the New York and New England Steamship Company, who are largely interested in Atlantic coast commerce, that an improvement of that harbor is very desirable as offering a port of refuge on a long stretch of coast, from Charleston to Wilmington, now destitute of any. I am also personally well acquainted with the country tributary to the Waccamaw, the Great Pee Dee, the Little Pee Dee, Black, Sampit, and Santee Rivers, which have their outlets in Winyaw Bay, and I know personally of the large commerce which will be developed by even a small increase in depth on that bar. A very small appropriation will increase the depth from 7 feet, which it is at present, to 10 or 12 feet; and I am sure there is not another point on the coast south of Norfolk where as great an amount of commerce is choked up and held back for the lack of a very few feet of water.

I write you this thinking it may possibly be of some service in your efforts.

Very truly, yours,

E. P. ALEXANDER, President.

General M. C. BUTLER,
Senator, Washington, D. C.

General Alexander expresses it aptly when he says that there is no other point on the Atlantic coast south of Norfolk where there is so much commerce choked up as at Winyaw Bay. I have seen it stated somewhere—I can not now lay my hand on the authority—that many vessels have been known to lie off that bar from ten to fifteen and some as many as twenty-one days, because they could not get in. As I stated awhile ago, this is a basin. There seems to be a pit on the Atlantic coast at this point where almost every river in South Carolina and I think about eleven of the State of North Carolina terminate. After I looked into the subject it surprised me that it has not been a place of more commercial importance than it is; but I have attributed it to the fact that the bar absolutely prevents the entrance and departure of vessels engaged in commerce foreign and coastwise. The depth of water is ample after you pass the bar; it is from 12 to 15 feet. There are from 6 to 10 feet on the bar; and by the expenditure of $300,000 we can increase that to 10 feet at low water; by the expenditure of $880,000 we can increase it to 15 feet; and by the expenditure of $2,500,000 we can increase it to from 15 to 20 feet. Georgetown is the chief commercial port.

If I thought it necessary to weary the Senate, I could read from the official report of the engineers showing the immense increase of the commerce of these rivers terminating at Georgetown since the improvement was begun in 1880. I recall just now that by the improvement of the Wateree River the increase in commerce has been $25 for every dollar expended. In the Great Pedee River my recollection is the increase of commerce has been $23 for every dollar expended by the Government, from something like $400,000 anterior to the improvement of 1880 to a million and odd thousand dollars at the last report.

All of these rivers terminate in this Winyaw Bay, and, as General Alexander has expressed it, the commerce there becomes choked up because ocean-going steamers can not cross the bar.

This project was first recommended in 1882, and it has been recommended every year consecutively from that time until the present. I have a letter here from the Chief of Engineers to the chairman of the committee of the House of Representatives, dated February 25, in which he says:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., February 25, 1888.

SIR: Your letter of the 21st instant, requesting to be informed why the estimate for improvement of Winyaw Bay was omitted, etc., has been received. In reply I have to say that in 1882 a project was submitted to Congress for the improvement of the entrance to this bay. (Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers, pages 1122 to 1127, inclusive.) Upon this project no action was taken. Again, in 1885 a project was submitted, in compliance with the river and harbor act of July 5, 1884, by Capt. W. H. Bixby, Corps of Engineers, the officer charged with that duty, estimated to cost about $2,500,000. In the report Captain Bixby stated that at least $300,000 could be profitably expended in commencing the project, and Col. W. P. Craighill, Corps of Engineers, supervising engineer, remarked, in forwarding the report, that "the commercial interests involved justify such an improvement."

With this report before it Congress appropriated $18,750 in the river and harbor act of August 5, 1886. As the amount appropriated was too small to be advantageously expended upon a work of such magnitude, it was a question of doubt with this Department whether it constituted an approval of the project by Congress, and therefore only $2,575.42 of this amount was expended in obtaining such data as would be needed before operations could be commenced understandingly and the balance was withheld, and the facts reported for the further action of Congress. (Report of the Chief of Engineers, page 136.)

This Department concurs in the views expressed by Colonel Craighill, and if Congress approves the project the amount of $300,000 can be profitably expended during the next fiscal year. It is impossible to obtain any results with the expenditure of so inconsiderable a sum as that now available upon a work of this character and magnitude.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. DUANE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers.

Hon. N. C. BLANCHARD,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
United States House of Representatives.

I can not see, in view of that state of facts, what additional information Congress wants or the War Department wants before this enterprise is entered upon in this bill.

I have here also a letter from a gentleman who is engaged in the steam-ship business, I believe a constituent of my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. This letter is addressed to Hon. Mr. ELLIOTT, who represents that district in the other House of Congress:

GEORGETOWN, May 25, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I notice by evening papers the committee have stricken out of harbor and river bill the amount for Winyaw Bay bar. As master of a steamer of over 1,000 tons capacity, running between this port and New York, I take the liberty of calling your attention to the great necessity of this being put back, and the relief so much needed granted. I am connected with people in New York who contemplate building another steamer for this Georgetown trade, but who would hardly be justified in doing so under the present condition of the bar.

At the writing of this my ship is now lying at the dock loaded, bound to New York, and can not leave until 9 a. m. to-morrow, and then at great risk, thus losing twenty hours' valuable time. I write, not as a politician with some ax to grind, but as a practical shipmaster who knows the needs of this port, the possibilities for it when this bar is deepened to become a large seaport, and where Government aid can not be more advantageously granted than right here.

I think our representatives from New York would willingly aid you in getting the sum needed if it was properly represented to them, as the merchandise from this port goes North, and if you think they can be of any assistance, would see to it on my return trip.

Trusting you will do all in your power for us that have to cross this, the most dangerous bar from Maine to Florida,

I am, your obedient servant,

F. C. MILLER,
Master Steamer Caroline Miller.

Hon. G. ELLIOTT,
Washington, D. C.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] asks me if Bixby's report has ever been adopted. Most assuredly. The supervising engineer, Colonel Craighill, has adopted it; the Chief of Engineers has adopted it, and I can not understand what additional information can be secured.

Mr. VEST. The present report estimates for this work.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly it does. I shall not detain the Senate longer. I trust that the Senate will not concur in this amendment of the Committee on Commerce. As I stated before, the appropriation was put in this bill after the most careful investigation by the House committee, and I confess I was a little surprised when I found that our committee had stricken it out and recommended the appointment of a board of officers.

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt that this bay ought to be improved, and that an appropriation should be made for the work. On the basis of the appropriation made by the House of Representatives this Winyaw Bay improvement should have $150,000. The engineers say that $300,000 can be expended profitably during the present year, and the House gave $100,000. I do not remember the discussion in the committee in regard to it, but if I had been there I certainly should not have agreed to the amendment of the committee.

Without delaying the Senate it is enough now to call attention to the report of the Engineer Bureau. They indorse the report made by Captain Bixby and ask that $300,000 be expended the present year. As to the importance of the work I will simply call the attention of the Senate to a single sentence:

The present commerce of this bay is that of the Waccamaw, Pee Dee, Black, and Sampit Rivers and Georgetown Harbor, a commerce of already $7,000,000 per year, carried by two hundred ocean vessels and two steamers making biweekly trips to Charleston.

I think $100,000 is a paltry appropriation to remove an obstruction to such a commerce as that. We are appropriating $550,000 for the Delaware River at the city of Philadelphia, and here now the Senator from South Carolina asks only an appropriation of $100,000 to remove an obstruction to $7,000,000 of commerce, with two hundred vessels, says the engineer, steam-vessels, ocean-going vessels, passing through the bay.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri was present in committee, and there was no difference of opinion in the committee as to the propriety of improving Winyaw Bay. There was an entire recognition of the amount of commerce now there and of the amount of commerce which probably would be brought there by reason of the improvement; but there were these three reports that $800,000 would produce so much water, another sum would produce so much water, and $2,500,000 would produce so much water. There was not anywhere a recognition by the Chief Engineer of any single project.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President, the Senator will permit me to interrupt him. As I understand the report, the results of the expenditure of $300,000, $880,000, and $2,500,000 were all stated as the different stages of a single project.

Mr. FRYE. Undoubtedly that is so.

Mr. BUTLER. So that when you get to the point of having spent $300,000 you get 10 feet of water on the bar. Congress may go further or not. If it is then thought desirable to expend $880,000 to get 15 feet of water on the bar, it is within the discretion of Congress to do that, and so on.

Mr. FRYE. No, Mr. President; it makes all the difference in the world as to what the ultimate project and purpose are to be. Take the appropriation made by the two Houses four years ago of $20,000 for the improvement of Winyaw Bay. What did the two Houses determine? That they were to enter upon a project requiring an expenditure of $2,500,000 when they appropriated $20,000. The engineers said, "We can not expend that money; it would be absurd." The only purpose the committee had was to have a determination as to what ought to be adopted as a project for the improvement of that bay. If this Board of Engineers determine, as they probably would, on the project of $2,500,000—because 10 feet of water is good for nothing on an ocean bay; you have got to have in these days of modern commerce 15 or 20 feet of water in order to accommodate the ordinary commercial vessels, even the ordinary tramps of the ocean—let us know it. I have no doubt that the report of this board would be in favor of the project of $2,500,000. I do not object on that account. All that the committee desired, looking at the appropriation of $20,000 four years ago, thrown aside by the engineers as utter nonsense, was that it was better to have a board examine the subject, and then let the appropriation be governed by the project to be accomplished.

Now, as the Senator from Missouri suggests, I have not the slightest objection so far as I am concerned to allowing the $100,000 to stand, provided the Senate will make no objection to the committee's amendment for a board, so that we may have the report of a full board and of the Chief of Engineers settling upon what plan shall be determined.

Mr. BUTLER. But the $100,000 can not be expended until the board reports?

Mr. FRYE. Oh, yes; it can. It can be used to go on dredging with.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I have no objection to that suggestion.

Mr. EVARTS. I hope the Senate will not concur in this amendment striking out the $100,000 appropriation, and that what is apparently a proper disposition in that regard will now be made.

My constituents in New York engaged in commerce have drawn my attention to this subject and with a good deal of interest and based upon a very intelligent and practical estimate of the value of this expenditure. I listened with great interest to the views of the chairman of the committee and of the committee itself, but I believe it must be conceded that all that exists now in matter of difference is whether there shall be a preliminary consideration of what shall be the ultimate expenditure and the ultimate result, while it is admitted that there is to be no waste towards that result if the present expenditure shall be made. I then can see no reason why we should not proceed with an amount now of expenditure if it should stop at 12 feet or at 15 feet or at 10 feet, for besides the great value to be attained by this lesser elevation of the tide, it is the best tentative and experimental inquiry of how much good will come towards the greater object if it be conceded, as I believe it is, that there is to be no waste from the present expenditure.

Now, I will agree that on the estimate of my constituents a very large improvement of this Winyaw Bay should be indulged in for the advantage of the country, but they are practical men, and they would like for the immediate use of commerce an increased draught for their vessels, getting as much beyond afterward as experiment shall show is useful. Nor do I see any disadvantage in continuing the amendment which will next be considered, provided, however, that before the word "improving," in line 272, we should insert the word "further"—"into the expediency of further improving Winyaw Bay."

Mr. BUTLER. I was going to suggest to the chairman that perhaps with the present language there might be some doubt by the War Department as to their right to expend this money until the report of the board comes in. The amendment as reported has this language:

Whose duty it shall be to examine into the expediency of improving Winyaw Bay, South Carolina.

Mr. FRYE. "Upon the plan submitted."

Mr. BUTLER. But in the mean time the Secretary of War might say, "I can not spend any of this $100,000."

Mr. FRYE. We can put in the words "to be immediately available."

Mr. EVARTS. The insertion of the word "further" before the word "improving" would meet that difficulty.

Mr. BUTLER. It does not strike me that it does.

Whose duty it shall be to examine the plan submitted by Capt. William H. Bixby—

Striking out—

Into the expediency of improving Winyaw Bay, South Carolina, upon—

So as to read:

And shall examine and report upon the plan submitted by Capt. William H. Bixby for the improvement of Winyaw Bay—

Transposing the words—

Whose duty it shall be to examine the plan submitted by Capt. William H. Bixby for the improvement of Winyaw Bay—

And striking out the words "into the expediency of improving."

Mr. FRYE. In the first place I will agree to the amendment of the amendment by striking out in lines 271 and 272 the words:

Whose duty it shall be to examine into the expediency of improving Winyaw Bay, South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. Say—

Whose duty it shall be to examine the plans submitted.

Mr. FRYE. Striking out "into the expediency of improving Winyaw Bay, South Carolina;" so as to read:

Examining the plan submitted by Capt. William H. Bixby, United States Army Engineers, for improving Winyaw Bay, South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please send up his proposed amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. The first vote to be taken, I believe, is on the amendment of the committee striking out the appropriation. I move that the Senate non-concur in that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The same object will be accomplished by refusing to agree to the amendment without a motion. The Chair will put the question. Will the Senate agree to the amendment striking out the appropriation in lines 268 and 269?

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 269, after the word "dollars," to insert the following:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to appoint a board of three engineer officers of the United States Army, whose duty it shall be to examine into the expediency of improving Winyaw Bay, South Carolina, upon the plan submitted by Capt. William H. Bixby, United States Army Engineers, under date of October 26, 1884. The said board shall report to the Secretary of War, who shall lay its report before Congress at its next session, with the views of himself and the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, I move to amend the amendment. After the word "examine" in line 272, I move to strike out "into the expediency of improving Winyaw Bay, South Carolinia, upon;" so as to read:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to appoint a board of three engineer officers of the United States Army, whose duty it shall be to examine the plan submitted by Capt. William H. Bixby, United States Army Engineers, under date of October 26, 1884.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. One further amendment is necessary. In line 276, after the date 1884, there should be inserted "for the improvement of Winyaw Bay, South Carolina."

Mr. VEST. Say "said bay."

Mr. FRYE. That will do.

For the improvement of said bay.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 286, after the word "improvement," to insert "on project for securing a channel 28 feet deep at mean high water, from the city of Savannah to the sea;" and in line 288, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ninety" and insert "two hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Savannah, Ga.: Continuing improvement on project for securing a channel 28 feet deep at mean high water, from the city of Savannah to the sea, $200,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have that explained. What does the amendment mean?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, it simply means that the appropriation made by the House of Representatives was entirely inadequate to the necessity of the case, entirely too small.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the point. I am making no objection to the $200,000 for this great purpose. That is quite right. But the amendment is "on project for securing a channel 28 feet deep," etc.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator will allow me to say that there is a special report on the Savannah harbor, under date of January 4, 1888, which shows that it is practicable to obtain a depth of 28 feet of water on the bar at Savannah, and the committee knowing the amount of water which is required for commercial ships nowadays desired to adopt in their recommendations this special report which was made by the Engineer Department for 28 feet of water.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now what is the whole thing going to cost, if we commit ourselves to keeping up 28 feet of water?

Mr. BROWN. That survey was made under the authority of the act of 1886, directing the survey to be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That there is no objection to.

Mr. BROWN. It is certified to by General Gillmore. The whole amount is $6,600,000 to complete the improvement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the necessity of inserting in an act of Congress a preliminary committal to the idea that this $200,000 must be spent on that project? The effect of it practically for the next two or three years might be that the engineers would be compelled to spend it in such a way as to be of no benefit to commerce at all for the time being, by digging it all out to 28 feet for 100 yards distance or however far it might come to, leaving all the rest just as it is, whereas if you leave it to the discretion of the Executive Department having it in charge if they think it desirable to go on, Congress appropriating money to try to get it to 28 feet, that is all right. Why declare in the statute that it shall be cut to 28 feet and kept there?

Mr. BROWN. For the reason that there have been two or three projects for the improvement, one following another. The last was for 28 feet of water. One hundred and eighty thousand dollars of the last appropriation have not been expended. The purpose is that that shall not be expended on the old project, but on the new project, and to put this $200,000 on the new project rather than to spend the $180,000 available on the old.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there anything in the old law which requires them to expend it to get 22 feet? I do not remember any such thing in the bill.

Mr. BROWN. The estimate then was for a channel 22 feet deep. One hundred and eighty thousand dollars of the amount then appropriated has not yet been expended. We appropriate now $200,000 in this bill, and we want the whole of it expended on the new project instead of spending the balance of the former appropriation on the old.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I can understand as a matter of administration, but unless the present law forbids the use of the money that is now available to secure 22 feet in an endeavor to procure 28, then there is no necessity for inserting this, as I think, extraordinary provision in the bill itself.

Mr. VEST. Let me make a suggestion. In line 288, after the word "dollars," insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the point that I am on, because a great deal more will be necessary, for my friend from Georgia says over $6,000,000 will be necessary to get 28 feet of water. My point is that it is unusual and bad legislation for Congress in advance to declare in a bill that this money must be spent in an effort to produce 28 feet of water, because that ties up all the discretion and engineering capacity of the Administration (and we all know that the Administration in a political sense has great engineering capacity, whether it has or not in a physical sense) to an effort to produce a result which can not be got for ten years; and therefore unless the law now forbids the use of this money, as I do not believe it does, why, as a matter of law-making, you shall say this money shall be spent on the idea of getting 28 feet, instead of expending it on the idea of improving that river in the best possible way, I can not understand.

Now I will look at the last river and harbor law, if I can find it, and see whether there is any limitation on the expenditure of the money already appropriated. [Examining the Statutes.] The provision in the act of 1886 is—

Improving harbor at Savannah, Ga.: Continuing improvement, $50,000.

Is that the item which bears upon this question?

Mr. BROWN. That was the last appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the Senator will see that there is no limitation in the law which requires the Secretary of War to be governed by one attainable depth or another, but it is left, as it ought to be, to his conservative expenditure of that money in the best way to obtain all the available depth that can be got. I think, therefore, that this clause, so unusual in a bill, and committing Congress in advance for ten years to the project of attaining 28 feet at whatever cost, is an embarrassment to the best use of the money rather than an aid to it. If I lived in that State, as far as I now understand the case, I would rather have those words out than in. Certainly I think it is bad legislation.

Mr. FRYE. The same thing occurs here as in the Winyaw Bay appropriation. It does make an immense difference whether Congress has determined to enter upon a project for a channel 125 feet wide at its bottom, with a depth of 28 feet, or upon a channel 45 feet wide at its bottom and depth of 10 feet. All the wing-dams, all the jetties, all the mattresses, everything of that kind which would do in the one case are utterly useless in the other case. It is of the utmost importance, when you make an appropriation for improving a river where jetties and mattresses and delimiting walls and things of that kind are required that Congress should understand what the project is that it proposes to do, and that the engineers should understand it, else they may go on and make an expenditure of $300,000 or $400,000, and the very next year, if they adopt a plan of increased depth and width the whole amount of money expended is thrown away. It is not, as the Senator from South Carolina suggests, the simple taking out of so much earth; it is all the difference in the world whether the earth taken out is to be on a bottom 125 feet wide or a bottom only 100 feet wide, if you have to put wing-dams and jetties and keep the scour clear, because the next year if you find you have to double the depth of the water and double the width of the channel, as likely you may, then the jetties you put in the year before are utterly useless, and you have to take them all out.

So it is exceedingly important when you make an appropriation to determine exactly what your project is, if you can. I admit there are cases where you can not; but it strikes me these are cases where you can. This special report sets out everything that is to be done on the Savannah River, the various points in the river, and the various jetties to be built, the heights of the jetties, the defining walls all the way down to the ocean. That is one plan to obtain 28 feet. I confess I am very decidedly in favor of the plan of 28 feet, because in ten years from now less than that for an ocean vessel will not be worth 1 cent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the argument of my friend from Maine as applied to this bill and these subjects is correct, then, so far as I can now see in running hastily over the bill, the only correct proposition in the bill is the one we now have under discussion.

Mr. FRYE. That is not so at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. For I can not find any other clause in the bill anywhere—there may be one, it is a very long bill, but the Senator can point it out if there is, I can not find it—in regard to any of the other rivers or harbors named in this bill where it is provided that the work shall be carried on upon a particular project of securing a particular depth of water. Here is Winyaw Bay, to which my honorable friend refers. The last bill that we passed on the subject contains no statement of what principle shall be employed of engineering or what end shall be attained in improving that bay. Neither does this bill. It appropriates the money, and then the money being appropriated, it directs the Secretary of War to make an examination and inquiry into a certain plan that has been submitted.

Mr. FRYE. But the committee did not do that.

Mr. BROWN. I call the Senator's attention to the very next page of the bill:

Improving harbor at Mobile, Ala.: Continuing improvement on enlarged project for securing a channel 23 feet deep and 280 feet wide, $250,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Georgia is right; he has found one other.

Mr. BROWN. There are a number of them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why are they not all so, then, if we have any?

Mr. BROWN. The bill is full of them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Senators say that there are other instances of this character. So much the worse for the bill and so much the worse for the principles of carrying on public works of this character, because it has happened in our experience—and these reports show it—that to-day or last year there is a report of the Chief of Engineers that says a particular thing ought to be done; he carries on that experiment for a year, and he finds that that particular thing ought not to be done at all, and that it is a great deal better to proceed in some other way. Now, if in advance by an act of Congress you provide that the thing is to be done in a particular way and for a particular mechanical object—I am not speaking of the great object of improving commercial facilities, but to attain a given mechanical result on the face of the earth by a certain performance—then you have got to stop and Congress has to begin again.

For one I do not wish to engage in that kind of legislation; and at this moment and on the information that we have I do not wish to commit the tax-payers of the United States to the obligation of paying upwards of $6,000,000 for getting 28 feet of water in the Savannah River. I would rather leave it to the Secretary of War and the engineers to go on upon whatever plan they choose to take. If they think 28 feet is a good plan, go ahead; and when they come for another appropriation Congress will be perfectly at liberty to understand whether it is likely to work out well or whether it is not.

Mr. BROWN. The bill does not commit Congress to go on and expend for that. Might not Congress stop and not make another appropriation?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is true in point of law and Constitution, undoubtedly, but in point of the influences—and I mean just influences of persuasion and committal that operate on the members of both Houses and are urged upon them—it is not so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The question being put, it was declared that the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not divide on it now, because that might interrupt proceedings, but I wish to reserve the amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be attended to when the bill is reported to the Senate. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, to strike out lines 289 and 290, as follows:

Improving harbor at San Augustine, Fla., $35,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to appoint a board of three engineer officers of the United States Army, whose duty it shall be to examine into the expediency of improving the harbor of San Augustine, Fla., upon the plan submitted by Lieut. William M. Black, United States Army Engineers, under date of December 12, 1887. The said board shall report to the Secretary of War, who shall lay its report before Congress at its next session, with the views of himself and the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army thereon.

Mr. CALL. I hope the amendment will not receive the sanction of the Senate. The improvement of this harbor is of great importance to the country in a national point of view. The harbors on the coast of Florida are of importance. Vessels passing around the capes of Florida to engage in the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico pass within a very few miles of the entrance to St. Augustine Harbor. The engineers report the facts of the case very clearly.

A Spanish map, dated 1791, shows the same conditions and depths. The harbor forms an excellent sheltered anchorage, but the shifting nature of the bar and the shallow water on its crest have presented so many difficulties to mariners that the commerce of the port has been greatly hampered, and as until recently the city has had no railroad communication with the interior, it has been limited to the necessary supplies for St. Augustine. St. Augustine was founded in 1665, and during the Spanish possession was the capital of East Florida, and as such its most important city. After the cession to the United States the city remained quiescent for many years, with little or no growth. Within the past few years it has greatly developed. It has been connected with the St. John's River and the interior by three lines of railroad—one to Jacksonville, one to Tocoi, and one to Palatka—giving it good rail connection with all parts of Florida.

The Atlantic Coast Canal connects this harbor with the Halifax and Indian Rivers. With the canal finished and the harbor so improved as to permit safe and free passage of coasting steamers, this would be the natural line for the transportation of the large and increasing quantity of fruits and vegetables raised along these rivers. This, with the railroad connections with Central and South Florida via Palatka, the Jacksonville, Tampa and Key West and the Florida Southern Railroads and their feeders, together with the safety of the port and its proximity to the ocean, will all tend to make St. Augustine the natural and best point of export for Northern markets for the fruit and vegetable trade.

Mr. President, you can not probably find anything that expresses more clearly the importance of the improvement of the port than this statement of the engineer. St. Augustine has an investment now of probably not less than $10,000,000 of the money of this country in different employments and properties, largely in hotels.

It is the resort of not less than twenty thousand persons every winter. It is naturally adapted better perhaps than any other harbor on the coast as a harbor of refuge and entrance in times of storm or distress for the commerce that passes along the coast of Florida. We can not have too many of them. The House of Representatives, in view of these facts, inserted this provision for the commencement of the improvement of the harbor.

The estimate for making this port a harbor is comparatively small, and the committee have thought proper to strike it out of this bill and to insert this provision, which has been done already, namely, a report by the engineers and by a commission of the importance of this improvement and a plan for making it. That has been repeatedly done, and is already contained in the report of the engineers, so far at least as is necessary for the amount here appropriated. I do not know any place where you can more beneficially to the national commerce expend this small amount of money than in the improvement of the harbor of St. Augustine.

You can not have too many harbors of refuge for the coastwise commerce of the United States or for the commerce that passes through the Gulf of Mexico, the whole of which finds its way into the Gulf stream, running nearer to the mainland at that point than any other. It is this fact which gives to St. Augustine a peculiarly mild climate. This great commerce passes immediately along the mouth of the harbor, within sight of it, and in times of storm requiring as many places of entrance as it can have. This small sum will be the commencement of an expenditure probably of not more than one or two hundred thousand dollars, which will make this port at all times easy of access to the entire commerce that passes along the coast. I think the Senate must see the importance of continuing the appropriation made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, I concur in all that my colleague has said, and I call upon the chairman to state why this amount has been stricken from the bill. I understand that no reason has yet been assigned for it.

There has already been a most careful survey made under the act of Congress, and as far back as 1829 the Government had this harbor surveyed for the purposes of commerce.

As has been already said, it is necessary as a harbor of refuge. For a long distance up and down the coast there is no other place to which vessels in distress can resort. It is of very great importance in that respect.

There are many millions of dollars invested at St. Augustine, and arrangements are being made for additional improvements there, and materials are being brought there by water, and commerce with it is carried on very largely by rail.

Unless there are some other reasons than those which appear in the report of the committee, I hope the Senate will non-concur in the amendment reported.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, my judgment is that the same reason applies to San Augustine and to Key West as applies to Winyaw Bay. This is one of those shifting harbors where an improvement is made and in a few years it disappears. As the Senator from Florida said, the map away back in 1791 shows it, and no project has been agreed upon that is thoroughly satisfactory for the improvement of this harbor, nor has there been for the improvement at Key West. The committee thought it desirable that there should be a full and thorough investigation by a board of officers to settle what should be done at Key West and at this harbor for permanent improvement, so that whatever is done shall stay. This has been improved over and over again and in a few years the whole thing has disappeared and all filled up again. Perhaps something may be done by the jetty system. They may agree on something which shall be a permanent improvement, and that is all the committee desire. The committee did not believe that one of these places ought not to have $35,000 and another one ought not to have $25,000. That is not a large amount of money to expend on either of these harbors.

The Senator speaks for Key West. The committee did believe that some project should be determined upon by a board of engineers, and that it should be confirmed and ratified by the Chief of Engineers, and that then appropriations requisite to complete those projects should be made by Congress.

Mr. PASCO. I hope the suggestion now made by the Senator from Maine will be accepted; but I think he is mistaken in one thing. No such appropriation has been made for the harbor of St. Augustine as he supposes, and there has not been the amount previously expended on it that he suggests. If this appropriation is stricken out now it will be postponed for another year, and I suggest that the same course be pursued that was pursued in regard to Winyaw Bay.

Mr. FRYE. I agree if Winyaw Bay is to be put back that San Augustine should be put back and Key West should be put back. They stand on the same bottom, all three of them.

Mr. PASCO. That is satisfactory. We do not object to an examination by a board of engineers. We accept that proposition.

Mr. REAGAN. There has been a reference to the general commerce at this locality. The commerce of the Gulf, passing out of the mouth of the Mississippi, going eastward, has to pass the capes of Florida to reach the Atlantic. For 400 miles, then, until reaching Cumberland Sound, there is no harbor of refuge. If properly improved there is a very good harbor at San Augustine, and if its entrance was opened it would afford a haven to vessels in distress, and would furnish the large commerce that passes around Eastern Florida a harbor of refuge in case of stress of weather. In addition to that—

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to appoint a board of three engineer officers of the United States Army, whose duty it shall be to examine into the expediency of improving the harbor of San Augustine, Fla., upon the plan submitted by Lieut. William M. Black, United States Army Engineers.

The same remark might be made about the improvement at Key West. A very large commerce passes out of the Gulf of Mexico around the capes of Florida, where there might be good harbors adjacent. No one familiar with the commerce of that country will doubt that there ought to be harbors of refuge. While I say this I do not under-estimate the local importance of these improvements; but all I desire to suggest is that that long distance of coast around the capes of Florida and up the eastern coast is without a single harbor of refuge for vessels coming from the Gulf.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRYE. Now, I desire the other amendment of the committee to remain as it is, with the exception of inserting after the word "of," in line 293, the word "further;" so as to read:

The expediency of further improving.

So that that report may be had which, in my judgment, is absolutely necessary. I want the board to determine how these harbors—they are the worst harbors in the world to improve—can be improved in some way that the improvements shall be reasonably permanent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is very true. I can see the force of that; but where is the force of spending the money until you know what you can do? The committee was right in its report.

Mr. FRYE. But the Senate in the Winyaw Bay appropriation determined the other way, and this stands on the same bottom with Winyaw Bay. Before the word "improving," in line 293, insert the word "further."

Mr. CALL. I desire to say that this small amount of money may be very usefully employed in temporary expedients to answer the present needs of commerce. I am informed by the engineer officer that the use of this money will deepen the harbor so far as St. Augustine is concerned considerably for present need, but it will not be a permanent protection against the shifting sand.

The engineer officer in charge designated a line of improvement which at moderate cost might be made permanent. The same is true in regard to Key West. It is the point of transit of all the commerce that passes along from Mobile to New Orleans, saving 100 miles, and when the prevailing winds upon the northwest channel keep it open this commerce has been saved this large amount of dangerous travel. I am informed that the use of temporary expedients will keep these channels open until some permanent system shall be devised and put in operation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine was not clearly understood at the desk. Does he propose to amend the part proposed to be inserted? The Chair understands that the Committee of the Whole have disagreed to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. The first clause of the amendment was to strike out the appropriation of $35,000. I thought only that was voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the amendment was to strike out and insert, which can not be divided.

Mr. FRYE. Then I ask to reconsider the vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Take it by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the action announced will be reconsidered.

Mr. FRYE. Now I move to amend the portion which it is proposed shall be inserted as I indicated: In line 293, before the word "improvement," insert the word "further."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion to strike out and insert as proposed by the committee.

Mr. FRYE. Why is not that divisible?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Because the rules forbid a division of a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. FRYE. Then I ask unanimous consent that it may be divided in the two cases of Key West and St. Augustine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the question will be submitted upon the motion to strike out and also upon the motion to insert separately. The question will first be on the motion to strike out—

Improving harbor at St. Augustine, Fla., $35,000.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the words proposed to be inserted by the Committee on Commerce as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Improving harbor at Pensacola, Fla.: Continuing improvement, $35,000.

Mr. CALL. Why is that?

Mr. FRYE. The surveys are provided for elsewhere.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 310, after the word "Florida," to strike out "continuing" and insert "to complete;" in line 311, after the word "improvement," to insert "from outer bar to Mangrove or Bushy Point;" and in line 312, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Tampa Bay, Florida: To complete improvement from outer bar to Mangrove or Bushy Point, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 313 and 314 of section 1, as follows:

Improving entrance to harbor at Key West, Fla., $25,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to appoint a board of three engineer officers of the United States Army, whose duty it shall be to examine into the expediency of improving the entrance to the harbor at Key West, Fla., upon the plan submitted by Lieut. William M. Black, United States Army Engineers, under date of May 31, 1887; the said board shall report to the Secretary of War, who shall lay its report before Congress at its next session, together with the views of himself and the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that this amendment is to be treated as the amendment from line 289 to 300?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PASCO. The motion to strike out is to be considered separate from the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first part of the amendment, proposing to strike out certain words, will be considered disagreed to, and the amendment proposing to insert the words from line 314 to 325 will be agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator from Maine, in line 312, in the clause in relation to improving the harbor at Tampa Bay, after the words "Bushy Point," to insert "including the channel" from that place to the town of Tampa.

My reason for that is that I should like the Secretary of War to have the discretion of continuing the improvement as it is going on from the town to this point. Bushy Point is the place of arrival and departure of steamers via Key West for Havana. There has been a considerable amount expended upon that channel, as will appear from the report of the Chief of Engineers, and I think it advisable to leave the matter in the discretion of the Secretary of War to continue the work that has been going on for years past. The city of Tampa is a prosperous seaport, and bids fair to be a place of great commercial importance. Between nine and ten thousand dollars of the former appropriation remain unexpended which belong to this improvement, and this amount and some part of the $50,000 may perhaps be usefully expended in improving this channel and other parts of the bay, including the Alobia, which empties into the Bay of Tampa.

Mr. FRYE. I shall be obliged to object to that. The old town of Tampa is now an inland town. No vessel will ever go to it or come from it. It is utterly useless as a harbor. It is a waste of money to put any money there whatever. Bushy Point is the point to which vessels will go hereafter, as the Senator from Florida must well understand, and the committee have very generously and liberally provided money enough to make a channel for a line of steamers drawing, I think, 10 or 11 feet of water, has generously provided for a channel sufficient for that line of steamers to Bushy Point, and no more than enough; not a dollar of it is to be thrown away at an obsolete point like Tampa Bay, which now is useless. I think the Senator from Florida ought to thank the committee with all his heart for this generous appropriation to give a channel there.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator will allow the vote to be taken on my proposition. There has been an improvement going on for years from the town of Tampa to deep water. The entrance over the bar may be made a very excellent one; vessels of 20 feet of water may be brought in over the outer bar and brought up to this point, Mangrove Point, with a small expenditure.

The vessels now engaged in foreign commerce there, and which are expected to be largely increased in number by the enterprising gentlemen who are interested in them, and which are now carrying the fast mail to Cuba, and another line projected to be built and I believe now in course of construction, to run to some portion of Central America—these vessels and the rapidly growing commerce, require that there should be a terminus in deep water and a good depth of water over the outer bar.

The importance of that can not be overestimated, but at the same time the channel from Mangrove Point to the town of Tampa, which has been in the course of improvement for years, will be used by the lighter draught steamers, and it is a matter of very great importance, as the shores of the bay are becoming filled with people and towns are growing up all through the peninsula. The town of Tampa is the base of supply.

It is not expected that there will be anything more than a depot for the shipping and the receipt of merchandise at Mangrove Point, and the town of Tampa will be the place of delivery of everything except sea-going steamers, and it is a matter of necessity to them that the channels to the town should be improved. For these reasons the work which has been going on should not be abandoned, but some part of this $50,000 may be added to the unexpended balance and used for the purpose of improving this channel, including the Alafia River.

All that I ask is that the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall have a discretion to continue that improvement with a portion of this money so far as it may be necessary or advisable; and surely the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers, acting upon their own examination and the information they have, are better capable of determining whether it shall be so or not than we are. All that I ask is that they shall have a discretion allowed them to continue this improvement with a portion of this money so far as it may be necessary or expedient to continue it. I therefore ask that this matter may be submitted to the Senate. This town of Tampa, with its fine bay, its deep water, and its excellent climate, will be very soon occupied with beautiful homes, and its foreign commerce is now an object of national importance.

Mr. PASCO. The amendment does not enlarge the appropriation. It only extends the power of the Secretary of War in expending it, and I hope the committee will not object to my colleague's amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The item, having been passed and agreed to, can only be returned to now by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 312, after the words "Bushy Point," it is proposed to insert:

Including the channel to Tampa.

Mr. FRYE. I hope this will not be agreed to. I stated before that the committee, on advice and consultation with practical sailors, with the men who are connected with this steam-ship line, determined, with an unusual liberality, to make immediately a channel of sufficient depth for the line, and I can not consent that any of that money shall be diverted to this old town of Tampa, which, in my judgment, is a fossil and utterly useless so far as commerce is concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I ask for a division.

Mr. FRYE. Wait until we get into the Senate.

Mr. CALL. Very well; I withdraw the call.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 346, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Ashtabula, Ohio: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. The amount allowed by the House is not large. It is only $30,000. The harbor has been under improvement for years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, at the end of the clause appropriating $10,000 for "improving harbor at Fairport, Ohio," to add:

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to agree with the Pittsburgh, Painesville and Fairport Railroad Company for such use and occupany of the pier at the mouth of Grand River, on the east side, as is consistent with public interests, upon such terms and conditions as he deems reasonable and just.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to request the Senate to non-concur in that amendment. There was, subsequent to the report of the bill, a hearing touching that matter before the committee, and it appeared conclusively that this railroad was practically adopting to itself the entire harbor, and that if this amendment passed it would gain control absolutely of the harbor, to the exclusion of the general commerce. The committee unanimously instructed me to request the Senate to non-concur.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, to strike out lines 367 and 368, as follows:

Improving harbor at Port Clinton, Ohio: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know it is always unpleasant to interfere with the report of a committee, and as a rule I take their judgment as conclusive; but I am satisfied in this particular, striking out this little appropriation of $5,000, they made a mistake. This appropriation is recommended by the Secretary of War and by the Engineer Bureau. It is to improve a port of not very great importance in one respect, but yet it is of comparatively considerable importance. The sum is small. I have a memorial in relation to it, signed by gentlemen well known to myself, to my colleague, and to others. I will ask that that be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

MEMORIAL.

To the honorable the Senators in the Congress of the United States of America:

The undersigned, citizens of the village of Port Clinton, in the State of Ohio, respectfully represent to your honorable body as follows:

First. Our town has a population of about 2,500; it is the county-seat of Ottawa County, and is situated on the shore of Lake Erie, at the mouth of the Portage River, which is navigable for ordinary lake craft to a distance of 12 miles inland.

Second. A new railroad is now in process of construction from this point which will place us in direct connection with the coal fields of Southeastern Ohio, and said road has commenced the building of docks, piers, and wharves to cost $60,000. It will afford an outlet to the South, Southeast, and Southwest for the lumber and iron-ore brought here by water. It will, if proper channel facilities are secured, make this a coaling point for the largest lake steamers, and will be the most direct passenger route from the interior to the summer resorts on the islands and at Lakeside.

Third. Since 1885 a line of steamers has been running daily during the season of navigation between this port and the Put-in-Bay islands, and does an extensive business both in freight and passengers, but the piers on either side of the channel are very much in need of repairs, and there is great danger that if the work is delayed another season the improvements already made will be almost entirely lost, and the business established by said steamer line be entirely destroyed.

It is therefore earnestly and sincerely prayed by the citizens of said village that such an appropriation may be made by the present Congress for the harbor of Port Clinton as will enable the Government to preserve the work already done for another year, by which time we expect to be in position to demonstrate beyond a doubt the importance of Port Clinton as a lake port and secure an appropriation adequate to the needs of our harbor.

MAY 26, 1888.

Respectfully,

The citizens of Port Clinton whose names are subscribed to the petition sent herewith.

PETITION.

To the honorable Senators in the Congress of the United States of America:

Mr. SHERMAN. I also have a letter from a leading gentleman in that region, from which I will read a short extract. He says:

Our people were highly pleased to learn that the House had allowed $5,000 for the improvement of our harbor in the appropriation bill passed by that body, and were greatly disappointed to hear that the Senate committee has stricken it out of the bill.

This really is a great misfortune to our shipping interests. With the present low state of the water it is impossible for vessels of any considerable carrying capacity to get in or out. There is to-day a barge loaded with lumber lying on the bottom inside of the piers, and she will be obliged to have her load taken ashore by lighters. If we could have had the amount allowed by the House retained in the bill, we could have had the channel dredged out to a depth that would admit large vessels.

The letter goes on and shows that they have spent some $50,000 in building requisite piers, etc., by private subscription. I know the locality myself. It is in the neighborhood of what are called the islands of Lake Erie, where there is a very large commerce, mainly in grapes and wine.

It is a matter of vital importance to this rapidly growing interest. I am quite sure that if the Senate Committee on Commerce had had these matters before them they would not have rejected this appropriation, and I therefore ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. The committee may have acted unadvisedly in regard to some amendments, although they examined the bill and the reports of the engineers with great care. I am certain, however, that they did not act unadvisedly in regard to this amendment. I will read from the report of the committee:

In 1870 a survey of the harbor was made, which showed the channel at the entrance to be narrow and intricate, with a depth of only 5 feet.

The original project provided for cutting a channel 8 feet deep through the outer bar, and constructing piers from the shore out to the necessary depth.

Efforts were made, without success, during the years 1872, 1873, and 1874 to obtain a channel by dredging only, but the required depth could not be maintained.

The present project, adopted in 1875, provides for a pile revetment, running from the north shore of the Portage River, opposite the town, 967 feet out into the lake in a direction north 57 degrees east; then inclining towards the north, a pile pier, about 1,500 feet long, extends to the depth of 10 feet in the lake; parallel to this, and 200 feet from it, an east pier, 2,600 feet long, to run out from the south shore of the river. It is expected that a full depth of 9 feet can be maintained by confining the waters of the Portage River between these piers.

The total amount appropriated for this harbor to date is $48,000, of which $46,000 has been expended, and has resulted in obtaining a depth of 8 feet from the lake to the town. It is estimated that $42,000 will be required for the completion of the project. The engineer in charge reports against the advisability of the expenditure at present on the ground that the commerce, present or prospective, is not such as to justify it. During the past fiscal year fifty-four vessels entered the port, with an average of 53.6 tons.

They were very small vessels, and not a large number. The report of the engineer in charge contains the following:

The sum of $46,000 has been appropriated and expended up to the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, but as the commerce of Port Clinton is small, and prospects for much increase in the near future are not great, it is doubtful whether the expenditure of the remaining $44,000 for the completion of the proposed project, under the revised estimate, would be advisable.

It will be seen, therefore, that the committee in striking out the appropriation of $5,000 for this improvement acted upon the report of the engineer in charge of the work, who reports substantially against it. He does not at least say that it is advisable to make the further expenditure of $42,000, on account of the small commerce and the little prospect of any great increase in the future.

Mr. SHERMAN. The answer to that is that I do not ask and would not ask the appropriation of $42,000 to complete this improvement, but I do ask that a sum sufficient be appropriated to dredge out and maintain the present condition of the improvement. If I were appearing here asking for $42,000 to deepen the channel it would be different; but all I ask is a sum sufficient to dredge out and maintain the status quo of this improvement.

I consider this so important that I shall have to ask for a division of the Senate upon it. This is a small matter, simply to preserve and maintain by dredging the present stage of improvement upon which already private citizens have expended $50,000 in the faith that the Government would maintain what it already had completed; and I hope that the committee will not object to leaving in the bill this small sum to make such necessary dredging as will maintain the present depth of water. I can not consent that the amendment shall be agreed to unless it shall be done by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio desire to have the question taken as in Committee of the Whole, or will he reserve the amendment for a separate vote in the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I prefer to have the question taken now because it is too small a matter to be continued long. The appropriation is only $5,000, merely for the use of a dredge-boat.

Mr. DOLPH. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that as it appears in the bill the appropriation is for continuing the improvement. It is to continue the plan already adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator may change the language if he chooses; I do not care anything about that. All we want is by dredging to maintain the present status. That will be continuing the improvement, but not according to the plan, because the money proposed to be appropriated would be insufficient to deepen the channel.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was rejected.

GETTYSBURGH REUNION.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 178) granting leave of absence to certain persons employed in the service of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read at length.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 178) granting leave of absence to certain persons employed in the service of the United States was read, the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the heads of Departments are hereby authorized to grant to all persons employed in the service of the United States who were present at the battle of Gettysburgh sufficient leave of absence, without loss of pay, to attend the reunion to be held at Gettysburgh on the 3d day of July next, such absence not to be taken from the allowance made by law.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the joint resolution be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the pending business be informally laid aside for the consideration of the joint resolution which has just been read. Is there objection?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is practically the joint resolution that passed the Senate a few days ago. It comes to us now as a House resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 737, to insert:

Improving the Ohio River: For constructing a movable dam on the Ohio River near the mouth of the Beaver River, $100,000, and the Secretary of War shall locate sites for three such movable dams between the dam hereby provided for and the dam at Davis Island: Provided, These dams shall, in his opinion, be necessary to the carrying out of his plans of improvement.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the committee have the approval of the Chief of Engineers of this scheme, and what is the probable cost to execute the plan of movable dams along the Ohio River? I make the inquiry because this scheme has been before another branch of Congress several times, and it was developed that the chances were—that was the conclusion reached by the committee there—that it would probably injure the navigation of the Ohio River more than it would benefit it, and that the system could not be completed as contemplated originally short of about $78,000,000.

I do not know the information which has been before our committee, but this seems to have in view inaugurating the plan of making movable dams along the Ohio River. I do not now remember the number contemplated in the plan that was formerly presented and urged, but I do know that it was regarded as likely to be very expensive and of very doubtful expediency. We had models before us, and this matter was discussed several times.

I suggest that before we enter upon this work it would be well for the Senate to understand what we are entering upon. If the Committee on Commerce understand that it is an expenditure of $78,000,000 and recommend it with that view, all well, for that is what the system originally intended to do.

Mr. BLAIR. I think it ought to be considered that the appropriation proposed is within one million of the amount of the school bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I did not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. BLAIR. I only suggested that it seemed to be worthy of attention that this was within $1,000,000 of the amount of the school bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I think it is about as absurd as the school bill was.

Mr. FRYE. When the Great Kanawha River was proposed to be improved in about the same way there were a great many who said that was absurd; but yet it has increased the output of coal from, I think, 4,000,000 tons to about 16,000,000 tons, and has decreased the cost to the consumer from 50 cents to a dollar a ton. I refer to the improvement of those dams in the Great Kanawha.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator that the output of coal was increased from 4,048,300 tons to 23,233,374 tons.

Mr. FRYE. I thank the Senator for the correction. It is an illustration of what may be done by the improvement of these rivers.

In the bill as it came from the other House there was a proposition for the purchase from the Monongahela Navigation Company of the upper lock and dam, the proposition being ultimately to appropriate to the United States by purchase all of the dams on the lower Monongahela River.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose I am misunderstood. I was discussing the item beginning at line 738 for the improvement of the Ohio River.

Mr. FRYE. Yes, and I was leading up to that by a reference to the Monongahela River. The committee determined to strike out the proposed purchase of those dams, not believing that it was proper at this time to enter upon that expenditure, but it was shown to the committee that the Ohio River at the points named here could be very greatly improved by the construction of movable dams at a cost of $100,000 apiece, and that four movable dams would be all that would be necessary to complete the entire improvement of the upper Ohio River, as I understand it. In the judgment of the committee it was thought entirely proper to enter upon that work, as it was now thought improper to purchase the Monongahela works. My impression is that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] understands the matter fully.

Mr. REAGAN. The illustration offered by the Senator from Maine is hardly precisely in point. There are no movable dams on the Kanawha River; there are locks and dams on that river. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] informs me that I am mistaken. Then they have been of recent construction.

Mr. KENNA. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state that on the upper part of the Kanawha River fixed dams are built because of the conditions which apply to ordinary and low water. In other words, the fall is great and in open stages the navigation is not large, but below Cannelton on the Kanawha are the movable dams. We need on the Kanawha River the benefit of this improvement only in low stages of water. In the ordinary stages the Kanawha is a good, successful, navigable stream, but in low stages of water, on account of the fall, the channel gets low and hence becomes unnavigable. In the ordinary stages of water these dams are lowered so that there is a 200-foot passage-way in the dams that allows the navigation to go on, just as it would without any improvement.

Mr. REAGAN. This proposed improvement on the Ohio is below the Kanawha?

Mr. KENNA. Oh, no; it is 240 miles above.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it above or below Pittsburgh?

Mr. KENNA. It is below Pittsburgh.

Mr. FRYE. Let me inquire of the Senator from West Virginia if the movable dam at Pittsburgh did not work perfectly?

Mr. KENNA. There never was any trouble, I understand, about the work of the movable dam except in the exigencies growing out of the conditions, which were abnormal this last winter, on account of the ice, so that they could not lower the dam.

Mr. REAGAN. The dam was built at Pittsburgh for the purpose of making a harbor there in which vessels might rest, in which they might load and unload; but it was presented to the committee who had charge of this subject at the time I speak of that the expense of the improvement of the Ohio River would be as I have stated. It is an open river for navigation, not like the upper part of the Kanawha, of which the Senator from West Virginia speaks, where movable dams were built on account of the great fall of the river; but in the Ohio River they already have good navigation. It was deemed then of very doubtful expediency and of very great expense, the amount that I suggested a while ago.

The dam which was built at Pittsburgh was constructed at very considerable expense, costing not a hundred thousand dollars, but several hundred thousand dollars; I do not remember how many hundred thousand dollars. It was built there for the purpose of making an artificial harbor for the rest and security of vessels—not especially in the interest of navigation, but for the making of a harbor for the rest of vessels.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think I heard the answer of the Senator from Maine, if indeed he answered the question of the Senator from Texas, as to the probable cost of carrying out this plan, if it is entered upon.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that only four movable dams are required, and that they will cost about a hundred thousand dollars apiece. That is, as I recollect, the testimony before the committee. I know the committee unanimously agreed upon this proposition. It was presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] practically as a substitute for the Monongahela provision which follows it, and the committee were satisfied that it was something which ought to be done.

Mr. REAGAN. I will ask what the nature of the testimony was about the cost of each dam being $100,000? Did it come from any engineer?

Mr. FRYE. My recollection is that it did, from letters of the engineers.

Mr. REAGAN. All I have to say is that the dam above this point, at Pittsburgh, cost many hundred thousand dollars, and my opinion is that it cost over half a million dollars.

Mr. FRYE. The appropriation for the one dam at the mouth of Beaver River is just $100,000. That is to complete it.

Mr. REAGAN. It may be a smaller stream. The Ohio River is a good, large river.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] presented to the committee an estimate from the engineers of the cost at $100,000 each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, to strike out the clauses from line 745 to line 802, inclusive, as follows:

The Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to negotiate for and purchase, at a cost not to exceed $161,733.13, lock and dam number 7, otherwise known as "the Upper Lock and Dam," and its appurtenances, of the Monongahela Navigation Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Pennsylvania, which lock and dam number 7 and its appurtenances constitute a part of the improvements in water communication in the Monongahela River, between Pittsburgh, in the State of Pennsylvania, and a point at or near Morgantown, in the State of West Virginia. And the sum of $161,733.13, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for consummating said purchase, the same to be paid on the warrant of the Secretary of War, upon full and absolute conveyance to the United States of the said lock and dam number 7, and its appurtenances, of the said Monongahela Navigation Company.

In the event of the inability of the Secretary of War to make voluntary purchase of said lock and dam number 7 and its appurtenances for said sum of $161,733.13, or a less sum, then the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to institute and carry to completion proceedings for the condemnation of said lock and dam number 7 and its appurtenances, said condemnation proceedings to be as prescribed and regulated by the provisions of the general railroad law of Pennsylvania, approved February 19, 1849, and its supplements, except that the United States shall not be required to give any bond, and except that jurisdiction of said proceedings is hereby given to the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, with right of appeal by either party to the Supreme Court of the United States: Provided, That in estimating the sum to be paid by the United States the franchise of said corporation to collect tolls shall not be considered or estimated; and the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the necessary costs of said condemnation proceedings; and upon final judgment being entered therein the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to draw his warrant on the Treasury for the amount of said judgment and costs, and said amount for the payment thereof is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. And when said lock and dam number 7 and its appurtenances shall have been acquired by the United States, whether by purchase or condemnation, the Secretary of War shall take charge thereof, and the same shall thereafter be subject to the provisions of section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation for certain public work on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved July 5, 1884.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill; and having read the item for improving New River, West Virginia, at line 805,

Mr. KENNA said: I ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to allow that paragraph to stand. I may have occasion to ask the consent of the Senate to offer an amendment which will involve the mere phraseology of the paragraph when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. To which item does the Senator refer?

Mr. KENNA. I refer to the New River improvement. I have a letter from the engineer in charge of that improvement, who suggests a modification of the phraseology to secure the general result, but I have it not at hand.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator desires to have it passed over for the present?

Mr. KENNA. I should like to have it passed over for the present, so that I may change the phraseology.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no occasion for passing it over. The paragraph will be open to amendment in the Senate.

Improving Cape Fear River below Wilmington, N. C., $245,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That needs an explanation, as it more than doubles the appropriation in the bill as passed by the other House. I should like to hear the report of the engineer upon that subject.

Mr. RANSOM. The clerk of the committee will hand the Senator the report of the engineer. This is the amount estimated to complete the present plan of that improvement. It completes the improvement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not say so in the bill. I should like to hear the committee's report on that point, at page 108, read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont desire to have the report read at the desk?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read as indicated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NORTH CAROLINA.

Cape Fear River.—Improving Cape Fear River, North Carolina, above Wilmington: Continuing improvement, $12,000.

Improving Cape Fear River below Wilmington, N. C., $245,000.

The Cape Fear River below Wilmington, when placed under improvement in 1829, had three bar entrances with least depths as follows: About 9 feet at the Baldhead Channel, 9 feet at the Rip Channel, and 10 feet at New Inlet Channel, these bars being, respectively, 2, 6, and 2 miles below the point which was then the head of the river's delta. From the head of this delta 20 miles up to Wilmington there were several shoals with a least depth of 7.5 feet at low water.

Between the years 1827 and 1857 projects of improvement were adopted involving dredging and jetty contraction of the channel, and $359,500.76 were expended. The works, however, were never fully completed for lack of funds. From 1872 to date plans of improvement have been adopted, which proposed the extension of the New Inlet dam 2 miles further down the stream to prevent the further erosion of Smith's Island at the Swashes; dredging upon the outer bar to assist the tidal currents in straightening and deepening the bar entrances so as to obtain a 14-foot depth at low water, and for the 20 miles above New Inlet dredging and diking where necessary across the shoals so as to secure a 16-foot channel, 270 feet wide at low water over this whole length.

Up to June 30, 1887, a total of $1,773,946.25 had been spent on the projects of improvement adopted since 1870 with great success, obtaining a 13.5 to 14 feet least depth of water at the main bar entrance, and completing a channel of 16 feet depth and at least 111 feet width 28 miles further to Wilmington. This depth, combined with the average rise of tide of 4.5 feet at the bar and 2.5 at Wilmington, is such that at present vessels loaded to 16 feet draught can readily go from Wilmington to the ocean in a single tide and any day of the year.

After the improvement is finished its proper maintenance may cost from $5,000 to $15 000 per year for a few years; but the improvement should be fairly permanent.

It is estimated that $245,000 will be required to complete the proposed improvement of the river from Wilmington to the ocean.

The effect of the improvement thus far has been to decrease greatly marine freights and insurance, and to increa e the foreign commerce by $4,500,000 per year since 1871, thus showing a development of $2.40 of annual foreign exports for each dollar once spent by the Government during the same period.

The present development of the Cape Fear River means the future development of the State of North Carolina, and of many Western States, which will before long be forced to send their commerce by new and shorter routes via North Carolina railroads and the Cape Fear River to the ocean and foreign markets.

The Cape Fear River above Wilmington has a total length of about 400 miles, and a drainage area of 7,167 square miles, of which 5,620 square miles lie above the mouth of the Black River, its main tributary.

The present head of navigation is at Fayetteville, 112 miles above Wilmington. When placed under improvement in 1881 this part of the river was navigable during the nine flush-water months of the year; but the channel for the upper 75 miles was badly obstructed by sunken logs, snags, overhanging trees, and shoals; and for the upper 66 miles it was full of shoals on which there was not more than 12 or 14 inches of water during the low-water season. At that time the navigation was owned by private parties.

Up to June 30, 1887, a total of $65,832.94 has been spent in all upon this improvement, giving a moderately well-cleared channel over the whole length of river, a moderately good 4-foot continuous channel during the entire year from Wilmington 44 miles to Kelley's Cove, thence a similar 2-foot channel 26 miles further to Elizabethtown, and thence a similar 1-foot channel 42 miles further to Fayetteville; increased to 5-foot draught from Wilmington to Fayetteville during seven months of the year. In consequence, three permanently-established steam-boat lines have been running over the entire distance with full draught for seven months each year, and with lessened draught for the rest of the time.

Freights have been reduced 33 per cent., marine insurance has been rendered unnecessary, and the commerce has been increased by $1,200,000 per year, thus showing a development of $18 of annual commerce for each dollar once spent by the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The particular recommendation of the local engineer is $265,000.

Mr. FRYE. Two hundred and forty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It reads here in the report of Captain Bixby, "Amount estimated, required for completion of existing project, $265,000," and he says that that amount can be profitably expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889; "submitted in compliance with the requirement of section 2 of the river and harbor act of 1866–'67." In the report of the engineer in charge (only a part of which is embodied in the committee's report), on pages 1045, 1046, and following, he illustrates what I said in regard to the Savannah River and the changes of plans and so on. It would seem that there have been nearly half a dozen different projects for the Cape Fear River, and that more than a million dollars has already been spent in experimenting on various contrivances in this way and that way; and now it is proposed to give the total amount that the local engineer recommends for completing the work, though not to give it in the bill as completing the work, but to give it as the ordinary appropriation for an improvement.

I am perfectly willing to improve the Cape Fear River in every suitable and reasonable way, because it is a river that is truly a commercial and navigable river of the United States, and it has a city at the head of its sea navigation, the city of Wilmington, which is a point that will accommodate the people of a great region of the United States undoubtedly. But going on in this way, making fish of one and flesh of another in regard to these ports, and appropriating the full amount that a local engineer says will be necessary to complete the work in one appropriation (and they have a large balance, it would appear, now, I believe, in hand besides), does not seem to be fair to the other portions of the country where similar improvements are going on and similar necessities continue to exist. There ought to be some reasonable uniformity in these respects, as it appears to me.

I should hope, therefore, that the Cape Fear River would stand on the same footing that the other rivers do. If this amendment is put on the ground that this is to complete that work, as the engineer says in his report, then it would seem to be rather wise to put it in the bill that this sum is intended to complete the work. But it is not in the bill. It is the ordinary appropriation for improving that river, and the next year we may have a local engineer who will say he wants $265,000 more, as perhaps he will; but if the bill is to follow the report it ought to say for completing that work, as we often do. It does not say so, and it does not appear to me that it stands on that fair equality of rating of benefits and burdens that is intended, as I suppose, to run through the estimates of the engineers as it does of the Chief of Engineers in general, and runs through the bill in general.

Mr. FRYE. I am satisfied that the intention of the committee was that this appropriation should complete the Cape Fear River improvement. There has been an expenditure of over a million dollars on the river. The Chief Engineer recommended that the work should be completed. It is quite an important river, and the proposition commended itself to the committee that we should just put in enough more to complete it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then say "for completion."

Mr. FRYE. My recollection is that it was intended to be for completion, and therefore I move, in line 814, to strike out "improving" and to insert "to complete improvement of."

Mr. RANSOM. I shall be very candid, Mr. President. I do not want to take any advantage or do anything covertly about the matter. I hope that Congress hereafter will upon another survey see the necessity of a further improvement of the Cape Fear River, and that at the right time the right way will be adopted, exactly as has been done in reference to every other large improvement in the United States.

I have no objection to inserting the words "to complete the present improvement" in the bill. The members of the committee will remember that I asked in the committee to have that done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the beginning of line 814 strike out the word "improving"——

Mr. FRYE. There is no need of striking that out. Insert, after "North Carolina," the words "to complete improvement."

The SECRETARY. So as to read:

Improving Cape Fear River below Wilmington, North Carolina: To complete improvement, $245,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no; say "to complete improvement" in place of the word "improving," to make it straight.

Mr. HARRIS. Then strike out the word "improving," in line 814, and say "to complete improvement."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will make it straight.

Mr. FRYE. All right.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope the chairman of the committee will allow me to amend the clause by saying "to complete the present improvement of the Cape Fear River."

Mr. EDMUNDS. This means the present improvement. I would not put in the word "present." We are all present.

Mr. RANSOM. I wish that to be done, so that hereafter, if I shall try in another year, as I expect to try, to have another improvement for the Cape Fear River under a different survey, Senators can not suppose that I would be guilty of any equivocation or misrepresentation in the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "To complete the improvement of" is the common phrase in all such items. Of course it does not prevent Congress hereafter from putting Cape Fear River down a thousand feet below its present depth, if it wishes to do so.

Mr. RANSOM. Then it is all right; I am satisfied.

Mr. FRYE. The phrase is used in thirty cases in the bill.

Mr. RANSOM. I am satisfied now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Maine indicate the exact language of the amendment he proposes to the amendment of the committee?

Mr. FRYE. Strike out the word "improving" and insert "to complete the improvement of."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the beginning of line 814, strike out the word "improving" and insert "to complete the improvement of;" so as to read:

To complete the improvement of Cape Fear River below Wilmington, N. C., $245,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 825, after the words "Tar Rivers," to insert "from the mouths to the falls at Rocky Mount;"

and in line 827, after the word "improvement," to strike out "five" and insert "ten;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Pamlico and Tar Rivers from the mouths to the falls at Rocky Mount, N. C.: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 829, to insert:

Improving Lumber River, North Carolina, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 832, after the words "North Carolina," to strike out "continuing improvement, five," and insert "from its mouth to Clarksville, Va., forty;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Roanoke River, North Carolina, from its mouth to Clarksville, Va., $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 834, to insert:

Improving Yadkin River, North Carolina, $10,000.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] if this "Yadkin River, North Carolina, $10,000," is the identical Yadkin River which is contained in a report from the Secretary of War of "localities unworthy of improvement by the General Government."

Mr. RANSOM. No, Mr. President. The chairman of the committee had the kindness to call my attention to that matter. This is not the improvement alluded to in that report.

The Yadkin River is a very long stream. The survey to which allusion is made in the report of the engineer was made under an amendment which I had placed upon a river and harbor bill some years ago. The engineer reported upon the improvement, and I have never asked for a cent in reference to that part of the river. There is another part of the river away above that, which has been the subject of improvement since 1879 in this body. The chairman of the committee will find in the engineer's report a strong report from Captain Bixby, and the amount here proposed to be appropriated is recommended by the local engineer and by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if there are two Yadkin Rivers in North Carolina?

Mr. RANSOM. No, sir; there are not two Yadkins there. The Yadkin River is a very long river. It rises in the mountains of North Carolina and goes down through North Carolina and out through South Carolina into the Pee Dee. The part of the Yadkin River that has been surveyed and which the surveyor says ought not to be improved (the part to which the Senator from Maine alluded), lies partly in South Carolina and partly in North Carolina, on which are the narrows of the Yadkin, and that proposed improvement has been condemned by the board of engineers. The same board of engineers before and since have recommended the improvement of another part of the river.

Some $80,000 have already been expended upon the improvement of the river, and successful results have been obtained from it. The report of the engineer shows that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my friend from North Carolina where the other Yadkin River is that the Senator from Maine referred to?

Mr. RANSOM. It is a part of this same Yadkin River.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it a branch?

Mr. RANSOM. No, sir; it is a continuation of the main stream.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then this is the river that is described in the report of the Chief of Engineers. This river "has a total length of about 200 miles and a drainage area of 4,320 square miles," somewhat less, I was going to say, than the city of Washington, including the flats; but rather more.

The Yadkin River, North Carolina, has a total length of about 200 miles and a drainage area of 4,320 square miles. Its middle third, extending from the railroad bridge near Salisbury 64½ miles upward to the foot of Bean Shoal, is the only portion so far under improvement by the General Government. This portion of the Yadkin River, prior to governmental improvement in 1880, had a slope of about 2 feet to the mile, and its navigation was completely obstructed by rock ledges, fish and mill dams, and numerous shoals, with a greatest depth of 1 foot at ordinary low water on some of its shoals and ledges. Its river commerce was therefore nothing. The original project of 1879 proposed, for $82,000, to secure a 2.5 to 3 foot steam-boat navigation during the entire year over the 64½ miles above the Salisbury railroad bridge.

This estimate must have been based mainly upon theoretical considerations, since subsequent practice showed that this sum was sufficient to give the desired depth of navigation for only two-thirds of the year and over only one-third of the distance. A personal examination of the river over the 32 miles above the Salisbury railroad bridge (made as soon as possible after assuming charge in 1886) confirmed these points, and moreover showed me the agricultural richness of the river basin and its urgent need for transportation facilities. By careful consideration of the original estimates as checked by my personal examinations and recent surveys, the estimates for the final cost of the work necessary to give the desired depth over the entire 64½ miles, and during only mean winter stages of water (two-thirds of the year) are herewith raised to $400,000.

I do not think it is necessary to read any more, Mr. President.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wonder that my honorable friend from North Carolina says he hopes not, because the reading is not altogether encouraging for this sort of an appropriation. The little State that I have the honor in part to represent has several rivers that are not so long but are a good deal deeper, so that they have as much water in them, though it is not spread over as much surface, as the Yadkin River; but we have never thought of asking Congress to appropriate money to clear out the sand-bars, shoals, rocks, and ledges to get 2 feet of depth of water for imaginary navigation.

If this is really a national work, then the rivers in Vermont that I allude to are too. It would be a great local convenience to the neighborhoods in getting to the railroads with their products and so on; but having been brought up Jeffersonian Democrats, we were really under the impression that those streams are not streams of that national and constitutional importance which under the authority of Congress to regulate commerce the people of Vermont had a right to ask the national Treasury to put in order for their passage.

I must say, with great respect to my friend from North Carolina and with the respect that I have for the Cape Fear River, which has been explained, that it does not appear to me that the Yadkin River falls within the class that Congress ought to deal with; but I suppose there is no help for it. I have tried it a good many years without any success.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, we have heard this talk before in reference to the Yadkin River. I have not thought it either necessary or proper for me, and I do not think it is now, to inquire more than we have done upon the Committee on Commerce in reference to the rivers in Vermont. We have generally tried to treat them just as we have treated the rivers in North Carolina and elsewhere.

This is not a new improvement. Since 1879 this improvement has been upon the river and harbor bills.

I did not say that I hoped the Senator from Vermont would not read any further because I was afraid of the report. I knew he would read all that would be pertinent to the subject. Let me say to that Senator that this is a very great improvement to the section of country through which it is to go. It is a part of North Carolina, and a large and respectable part of the State heretofore absolutely cut off from improvement. If the Senator will do me the kindness to read on in the report he will see that the engineer says so, and that when this improvement is completed it will largely develop a commerce which is now almost nothing, and prove of great benefit to that section of the State.

I ask pardon of the Senate for taking up any time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator, before we leave this item, because it will illustrate a great many other items in the bill, and I know my friend's State can stand it as well as any, how many months in the year this river is navigable at all, even with the improvement?

Mr. RANSOM. If this improvement is made, in my judgment the river will be navigable the year round.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many months in the year is it navigable now for vessels drawing 2 feet of water?

Mr. RANSOM. The river is now scarcely navigable at all. This improvement is making it navigable. This improvement is intended to make the river navigable for 64 miles.

Mr. President, there is scarcely a river in this country that at one time did not fail to be navigable because of obstructions at its mouth. We heard the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to-day eloquently and forcibly represent that commerce was checked at the mouth of a river unless you took out the obstructions. We have heard the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] upon the same subject. I may be mistaken about it, but I think I have known the Senator from Vermont to represent to the Committee on Commerce that with a very small appropriation made to what appeared to be a small stream in the State of Vermont it would become a very great convenience to the public. No doubt he represented it correctly. Just so when this stream is cleaned out, if this improvement goes on, it will be a great thing for that part of North Carolina.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there is no railroad along that river, I dare say it would, if you can make a river there. It may be like that other river, I think it was in North Carolina, in the time of one of my friend's predecessors who had an amendment of this kind to a bill, and the report of the engineers was read; and it appeared from the report of the engineers, soberly and truly and officially made, that the river could be made navigable, but in order to do it, it was necessary to build pumping works on the other side of the mountain and pump water over to it; and it was estimated that it would cost so much, not a very extravagant sum, a million or two of dollars.

Mr. RANSOM. That is a piece of imagination on the part of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all; I am speaking with all truth and soberness.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator means to tell the truth about it; but let me show him just how far he is mistaken. I suppose the Senator thinks that it may be a little bit interesting to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With great pleasure, Mr. President.

Mr. RANSOM. There was a survey at one time in reference to what we hoped might be a great water way. It was attractive to my friend going down to shoot ducks in Currituck.

Mr. BUTLER. The French Broad?

Mr. RANSOM. No, sir; it was a hundred miles from the French Broad, away down on the Atlantic Ocean, where you could hear the great surf and the waves beat. We had a survey made so as to see what could be done. A brilliant engineer, as the Senator from Vermont said, reported that it would be very practicable if they had water enough, but he said he knew no way in the world of getting water there. He said perhaps that somebody had suggested that it could be pumped up, but nobody ever dreamed of doing that. Nobody has ever made a suggestion about it. That had nothing in the world to do with the improvement under consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. What part of the Yadkin is it proposed to improve?

Mr. RANSOM. From the main line of the Richmond and Danville Railroad, going on this side of Salisbury up to the mountains, 64 miles. I wish my friend from Vermont could go down and look at the Yadkin, see it on a rise or swell, or see it when it was low in the summer season, although it is a perpetual stream. My impression is that there is no stream in the United States that falls less during the summer season than the Yadkin, for it is made up of mountain streams that come pouring down. If my friend from Vermont could go down there one day with me, he would be ashamed of every river in Vermont. He would say, "Well, the Senators from North Carolina from time immemorial have been trifling; they ought to have had more money; instead of having a few thousand dollars they ought to have had a million or two millions of dollars spent upon this great stream."

A few years ago the Senator from Vermont had these same ideas about the Cape Fear, but he went down and saw it with the engineer and his friends. Our people were glad to see him there, and carried him down to South Hope, formerly Smithfield. He went down the river, and when he saw the breadth and the depth and glory of Cape Fear River, he came back and, except a little irony, he has not said one word about it since. He has always admitted it to be a great and good stream.

Mr. President, I wish that I was in the humor to speak to-day, but this weather is too warm. I wish we were not here in open Senate; I wish we were in executive session, so that I might describe that river of love which the Senator from Vermont has been inviting the Committee on Commerce to see. I have seen that distinguished Senator send for three different maps and charts, and special ones, before he could find the river he wanted to get an appropriation for.

Mr. BUTLER. In Vermont?

Mr. RANSOM. In Vermont. The chairman of the committee and every Senator here will bear me out in the statement. He knows there is no imagination in that. And now he comes and fights the Yadkin. It was right to improve the creek up in Vermont, but, as a Senator once told me, he hoped I would give better names to my rivers in North Carolina. I think I would change the name Otter and make it Attar—Attar of Roses. I do not know much about perfumery, but I know the Yadkin is a great big river, and when my friend comes down some day and looks at it he will see that I was right in trying to have it improved, and he will thank me for it.

Whenever there has been an improvement suggested in my State and I became satisfied it was not right and was not good, I have abandoned it. Where I thought it would do no good, I have abandoned it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As to the Vermont river, my friend is drawing, as he well may, because he has a boundless fountain, upon his imagination; but it is very pleasant to hear him even when he is speaking of imaginative matters, as well as it is when he is speaking of matters of fact. I have no doubt about the necessity of the improvement of the Yadkin River. I am not entirely ignorant of it. I have crossed it four times within the last six months; but I did not have half the hesitation on either occasion that Cæsar is said to have had about crossing the Rubicon, which I believe the Roman Senate never appropriated anything for the improvement of, so far as I have read.

But the Yadkin River is a great river. The Senator says he wishes I could see it on its rise and flush, or whatever you call it, and he is supported by the engineer in that respect, for the engineer says that all the works of clearing the river channel were prevented before June, 1887, by high water. Then he goes on to add that when the high water got down the water was so low that nobody could do anything with the river. It is very high in high time. There really is not any water in it in low time. I will read just what the engineer says about the low water. I read literally what he said about the high water.

Seventy-seven thousand two hundred and sixty-five dollars and ninety cents has been spent, in all, upon this improvement up to June 30, 1887—

It is a pity they had not put on it the odd 10 cents—

in securing a good channel for flat-boats (and only an indifferent channel for steam-boats) of 40 to 70 feet width—

That is the channel, not the steam-boat, I presume—and from 2 to 2½ feet depth during mean winter stages of water (eight months of the year) from the Salisbury railroad bridge, 21 miles upward, to above Swicegood's Mill. No river commerce has yet been created—

Seventy-seven thousand dollars has not got any river commerce for a single foot of that stream—and none is expected until the improvement reaches Bailey's Ferry, 35 miles above the Salisbury railroad bridge.

I can not infer from what I have seen of the magnificent State of North Carolina that for this 21 miles there is a desert, an impassable, uncultivable mountain region, that is incapable of habitation, and that does not rejoice in tobacco, and wheat, and corn, and cattle, and horses, and all that makes North Carolina so famous. But $77,000, speaking seriously, spent upon 21 miles of this river and making 2½ feet depth of water in the winter when the water is high, has not yet produced any commerce at all.

I can say in all seriousness to my friend that I am glad to do anything I can for North Carolina, but I do not want to tax the people of North Carolina, or Vermont either, to try to make the Yadkin River a navigable stream, unless we go into the pumping business and get some water in.

Mr. RANSOM. I do not want to say anything more about this matter, because my friend from Vermont has touched me so lightly upon the Yadkin that I ought to be thankful to him. Some envious gentlemen on this side of the Chamber are really suspecting me of being on too good terms with that Senator and getting him to help the amendment through. But there is no doubt that the amount of money stated was spent upon the river. The Senator from Vermont says that $77,000 were spent to secure a channel 70 feet wide and 2½ feet deep, and that it is an enormous sum and will ruin the country. If the Senator from Vermont would think for one second he would know that there is not a railroad in this country carried through a hilly or mountainous region that does not cost from $30,000 to $77,000 a mile to construct it. Then you can run but one train upon it, and here you can run boats up and down and through the stream as you please.

It is said there is no commerce on the Yadkin. It is true there is no commerce on it yet. Until last year there was no commerce on the Tennessee River through the Mussel Shoals, and there will be on that river in the future perhaps the greatest internal commerce in this country. Why was it? It was because the work had not been completed; but as soon as the work is completed and steamers can go through you will see commerce there, just as the engineer says there will be no commerce on the Yadkin until the improvement is completed up to a certain point, and then it will come in.

The Senator from Vermont is right when he says that it is not a desert land. It does produce tobacco, corn, wheat, and much more. Make this improvement and a valuable commerce will be developed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I became so mystified and delighted with the eloquence of my friend from North Carolina that I forgot to read the report of the engineer in charge, of the 15th of December, 1887, upon this subject of the practicability of making the Yadkin as available for the purposes of navigation as its intrinsic merits undoubtedly entitle it to. Here is what the engineer says:

Since the date of this preliminary report I have examined the river in person, in a small row-boat, over the entire length above specified—

That is the length proposed to be improved—and at a time when the water was at nearly its lowest stage. The middle portion of this river from the Grassy Island Shoals upward 16 miles, was found to be comparatively level, and in itself could be easily made navigable"— at low water for boats drawing 4 feet—

These 16 miles—

That is very good—

but there would be no way of connecting this navigation to other navigable parts of the river below, or even to nearest railroad, except at a cost to-day out of proportion to the resulting benefits. The rest of this river, the general features of the whole river, the cost of its improvement, and the statistics of commerce were found to be practically as already described in the preliminary report, to which you are referred for fuller details.

In my opinion this river-basin is one of considerable water-power and of great agricultural wealth, but at the same time one which is at present best adapted to development by the construction of a railroad up its valley, instead of by the improvement of its water ways. Moreover, the people along the river appear anxious to have an open passage cut through the existing fish-dams, more to allow fish to ascend the river than to facilitate the river commerce.

That was the case, I believe, several years ago in West Virginia, before either of the present Senators was here, where an appropriation had been obtained in a preceding year, and it was made the foundation for a secondary one for cutting away the brush and the logs in a certain stream in West Virginia, and it was found on examination that that stream was not either nationally or locally a navigable stream at all, and that the only benefit that would accrue to the public—and that I admit is a great benefit—would be to fishermen (including Senators) who go up and down in canoes fishing for trout, for it is a very good trout stream.

Mr. KENNA. The Senator will pardon me. I do not quite understand to what stream in West Virginia he alludes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can not remember the name of it. As I said, it was before the Senator came into this body, or his colleague either.

Mr. KENNA. I believe I have read of streams so characterized by the newspapers; but no such stream in West Virginia has ever received an appropriation from Congress. There is not a stream in West Virginia upon which a dollar was ever appropriated where there could not be demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Senator himself the absolute propriety of the appropriation and its benefit to the Government. The West Virginia Senators have ample opportunity for fishing without asking appropriations for trout streams.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad to know that both in the beginning and the end of my friend's discourse——

Mr. KENNA. And in the middle of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And I repeat, without using it in any Pickwickian sense, that my recollection is at fault if there does not appear either in a bill or an act of Congress—I can not say that it became a law—a proposition for cutting out the brush and logs in a certain stream, and that with what light we could get at the time, ten or a dozen or fifteen years ago, for aught I know, it appeared that the only value that stream had to anybody besides floating logs was the value of its fishery interest, which, of course, we Republicans are all for just at this present time.

Now, I come back to the rest of this report of the engineer about the Yadkin—

Moreover, the people along the river appear anxious to have an open passage cut through the existing fish-dams, more to allow fish to ascend the river than to facilitate river commerce.

Since making the above-described examination, I have visited other rivers of similar nature—

I suppose North Carolina, like Damascus, has a good many other rivers than the one mentioned in Scripture—upon which there already exists a more or less successful pole-boat navigation.

As a result of all these examinations, I am now of the opinion that the steep descent of the Yadkin River, its comparatively small volume of water at ordinary stages, and its large extent of rocky bottom render any extended navigation of this river impracticable except by the aid of locks and dams and the extensive removal of rocks between these dams; that the cost of any such improved navigation (even for rafts and barges) is here altogether too great (see preliminary report), in comparison with the advantages to be derived therefrom, until the mineral resources of the river-basin are much more fully developed than at present; and that under these circumstances, this river, within the limits of the prescribed examination, is not to-day worthy of improvement by the General Government.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. H. BIXBY,
Captain of Engineers.

THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, if the Senator from Vermont had paid attention to the inquiries suggested to me by the chairman of the committee and to the attempt I made to make my answer clear, he would have seen that he is now reading from a different survey entirely—a survey not of the part of the stream on which the improvement is to be made, but a survey 50 miles below it and in no way connected with it.

Why, Mr. President, this same engineer and the Chief of Engineers in the reports before us recommend this improvement and make an estimate for it, putting it down at $10,000. That is a different part of the stream. That is a part of the stream that I said to-day I never had asked an I never would ask an appropriation for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we can safely divide or have the yeas and nays on this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I do not know how he would vote if present; therefore I refrain from voting.

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GRAY. My pair is with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], a member of the Committee on Commerce, and as this is a committee amendment I consider myself at liberty to vote "yea."

Mr. BUTLER. I am informed upon inquiry that the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "yea" upon this proposition, if present, and I therefore record my vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. I do not know how he would vote if present.

Mr. RANSOM. He would vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER. Then I vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], but I am informed that the Senator from Kentucky, if present, would vote "yea" on this amendment, and therefore I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 6; as follows:

Mr. MANDERSON. I think it is quite evident with the number of pairs that there is no quorum to vote on this bill at this stage; and I move therefore that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 28, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 27, 1888.

Mex.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House communications from the clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting conclusions of fact and of law in the following spoliation claims; which were severally referred to the Committee on Appropriations, namely:

Ship Speculator, Charles Frances Adams, administrator, and others, claimants;

Schooner Elizabeth, Frederick J. Huntington, administrator, and others, claimants;

Sloop Farmer, Charles Francis Adams, administrator, and others, claimant; and

The brig Sallie, Charles T. Lovering, administrator, and others, claimants.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN APPOINTED OR ENLISTED MEN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men in the Navy and Marine Corps from charges of desertion, with Senate amendments thereto.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman who offered this bill is absent, I ask unanimous consent that it be withheld for the present.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that can be done.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. HERBERT said: Mr. Speaker, in relation to the bill laid before the House a moment ago with Senate amendments, in relation to desertions from the Navy and Marine Corps, which the gentleman from Virginia asked to be withheld for the present until the return of Mr. BOUTELLE, I ask that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments and ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes thereon.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The conferees will be appointed some time during the day.

UNLAWFUL GRAZING—INDIAN LANDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8393) to protect the lands belonging to the Indians from unlawful grazing purposes; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills; which were read twice, and referred as follows:

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (S. 2833) granting a pension to Caspar Blanke, of Portland, Oregon, was improperly referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Without objection, that committee will be discharged from its further consideration, and the same will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence, for one week, was granted to Mr. HEMPHILL.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HOLMAN. To-day is set apart for discussion of the tariff bill. The Committee on Ways and Means, I think, however, are not inclined to interfere with the finishing up of the bill under consideration last night, providing it is proceeded with at once. So with reluctance I call for the regular order.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that there is no quorum in the House, and he might just as well let other business go on.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am under a pledge to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] also demands the regular order.

MARTHA F. WOODRUM.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send the report to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the House bill 2805 granting a pension to Martha F. Woodrum, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same.

T. L. THOMPSON,
J. LOGAN CHIPMAN,
W. GODFREY HUNTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

C. K. DAVIS,
JOHN H. MITCHELL,
D. TURPIE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF HOUSE CONFEREES ACCOMPANYING REPORT.

The effect of the action recommended in the above conference report is to give the claimant a pension of $50 per month instead of $12 per month, the rate provided by the general law, because of her helpless condition by reason of total blindness and extreme poverty.

T. L. THOMPSON,
J. LOGAN CHIPMAN,
W. GODFREY HUNTER.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California, moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the call of committees, and that gentlemen having reports to make may send them to the Clerk for proper reference.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

ISAAC HURD.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 9935) to increase the pension of Isaac Hurd; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY ANN SHOOK.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2702) granting a pension to Mary Ann Shook; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. DELILAH WHIPPS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3764) for the relief of Mrs. Delilah Whipps; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

OBSTRUCTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Mr. BLANCHARD, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported back with amendments the bill (S. 27) to prevent the obstruction of navigable waters, and to protect public works against trespass or injury; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. S. BRANTLY.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. 3469) providing for the payment of $450 to W. S. Brantly, executor of J. H. Brantly, for damages to property by United States troops in 1865; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the House, the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the hour for the consideration of reports from committees be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The call rests with the Committee on Military Affairs, which the Chair thinks is not ready to report.

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT TO LAND LAWS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be now taken up.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That as to all lands hereafter sold the United States expressly reserves from sale all coal deposits therein; but notwithstanding this express reservation the purchaser of any such lands, his heirs, lessees, and assigns, may mine and dispose of coal in any such land until such time as Congress in its discretion shall determine that the public good requires further legislation in relation thereto, and shall by general laws take the control of any such coal deposits for the purpose only of protecting the same from monopoly and secure the product thereof at reasonable prices to the people; and such reservation shall be expressed in all patents issued for land hereafter disposed of under the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. This amendment was offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. COBB. Is this proposition debatable now?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question has been ordered upon the amendment and upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. COBB. I appeal to the committee to open this matter. A very important proposition is thrown upon the House at the end of this bill, and it ought to have some discussion.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, it has been discussed, but the gentleman was not present.

The SPEAKER. There can be no debate, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent that a limited time be allowed for debate upon the proposition.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman indicate the time?

Mr. COBB. Half an hour.

The SPEAKER. I suppose to be divided equally between the opposers and supporters of the amendment?

Mr. COBB. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama be allowed five minutes in opposition to this amendment, and that the same length of time be given to some gentleman on this side in favor of the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The question being taken, there were—yeas 131, nays 38, not voting 155; as follows:

So the substitute was agreed to.

Pending the roll-call the following proceedings took place:

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague, Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. If he were present, I would vote "no."

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "ay."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague, Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I did not suppose that this was a political question, and I do not now think it is, but as a matter of precaution I will withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the pairs all provide that members may vote if necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is it necessary in this case?

The SPEAKER. No quorum has yet appeared.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I will let my vote stand. I do not know how my colleague, Mr. HENDERSON, would vote on this question.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances I will vote "ay."

Mr. LYNCH. Under the same circumstances I will vote "ay."

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. I am paired with Mr. FLOOD, but under the circumstances I shall vote "ay."

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired and may have to withdraw my vote, but I will vote to make a quorum. I vote "ay."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague, Mr. HOUK, but if allowed to break the pair to make a quorum, I will vote "ay."

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. HAYDEN. If permitted to vote, I will vote "ay."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the practice of voting after the roll-call is completed is irregular and not allowed by the rules, but as there has been no objection in this instance, and as it is necessary to make a quorum, the Chair has not endeavored to enforce the rule. The proper way, however, is for gentlemen who are paired to vote in the first instance and afterwards withdraw their votes if they are not necessary to make a quorum.

The Clerk proceeded to recapitulate the vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the recapitulation of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Mr. WEAVER. I object.

The Clerk recapitulated the names.

The following-named members were announced as paired until further notice:

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The next amendment (proposed by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

Add to section 3 the following:

"No railroad corporation, or corporation formed to carry on the business of common carriers, shall have a right to enter any land under this section, or at any time in the future to acquire by gift, grant, or devise any land entered under this section; nor shall said railroad corporation, or corporation formed to carry on the business of common carriers, at any time in the future carry on the business of mining, either in their own names or the names of other persons, on land so entered."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment (proposed by Mr. SEYMOUR) was read, as follows:

Add to section 11 the following:

"Any portion of an abandoned military reservation located within the limits of an incorporated city may be set apart and reserved by order of the President for public purposes."

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be modified by striking out the words "set apart and" so as to read "may be reserved," etc. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] consents to this modification.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the modification requested will be made.

There was no objection; and the amendment was accordingly modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The next amendment (proposed by Mr. BIGGS) was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out, in line 3 of section 13, the words "three hundred and twenty" and inserting "six hundred and forty;" in lines 8 and 9, section 17, make the same amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as the gentleman from California [Mr. BIGGS] was deprived of the opportunity of being heard on this proposition, I ask unanimous consent that he now be allowed five minutes to explain this amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. BIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably detained from the House the other night when this question was up for consideration. The committee have treated me very courteously, but I do not feel disposed to occupy much time.

I am satisfied that it is a great mistake to undertake to fix 320 acres as the maximum amount of desert land which may be taken up by any one person. I am very familiar with this question, and I have received some forty letters, which I could produce if necessary, asking that the present law on this subject—allowing 640 acres of desert land to be taken up—be continued in force. No man can make a living for himself and his family on 320 acres of desert land, because the improvement of such land requires a large amount of money for the purpose of bringing in water to irrigate the land that it may produce something.

Under the provisions of this bill a person holding such land is allowed to mortgage only 160 acres. The consequence of the legislation as proposed in this bill will be that hundreds of families will be compelled to abandon the homes they have undertaken to establish on these tracts of desert lands. Without trespassing further on the time of the House, and thanking the committee for the courtesy extended to me, I will only say that the adoption of the provisions of this bill without the amendment I propose would do great injustice to persons who may wish to locate with their families on desert lands for the purpose of establishing homes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BIGGS, it was rejected.

The SPEAKER. All the amendments have now been disposed of. The question is on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time, on which the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. MCRAE. I ask consent to print in the RECORD some remarks on this bill and amendments thereto.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that a general leave to print remarks in the RECORD on this bill will be granted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen desiring to do so may print remarks in the RECORD on this bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have here a very interesting report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the subject of coal lands. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MCRAE. I think I ought to object to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Indiana could publish this report in the RECORD as a part of remarks printed under the leave just granted.

Mr. MCRAE. This information ought to have been furnished to the House before the vote just taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. The report only came in this morning.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, the idea of submitting a letter from the Department after the vote has been taken on propositions which revolutionizes the policy of the Government in regard to the mineral lands of the country ought not, I think, to go unrebuked. The vote was had this morning after the letter was received.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will allow a public communication from the Land Office on an important subject to be printed. If not, I will introduce the report as part of my remarks.

Mr. MCRAE. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection is withdrawn, and the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, June —, 1888.

SIR: In accordance with your recent verbal request of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, he has made a report expressive of his views relative to House bill No. 9957, a copy of which report I transmit herewith.

Very respectfully,

WM. F. VILAS, Secretary.

HON. W. S. HOLMAN,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 26, 1888.

SIR: Replying to the verbal inquiry of Hon. W. S. HOLMAN as to my opinion of the propriety of the passage of H. R. bill 9957, to provide for the discovery, location, and reservation of coal in public lands, I have the honor to state that I have given the subject my earnest consideration.

The question as to how the remaining coal lands belonging to the United States shall be disposed of so that they may be developed as rapidly as the growing population of the country and especially of the great West requires, is one of much interest and magnitude.

The almost boundless prairies in the West, the scarcity of timber for fuel and other purposes, the rapid increase of population, the severe winters incident to much of the country, the demand for fuel for domestic and for manufacturing purposes, all conspire to make it a matter of the greatest moment that the coal mines belonging to the Government should be rapidly and judiciously developed.

There is, however, another consideration connected with this question which is of equal if not greater importance. In the disposition by the Government of its coal lands, justice and fair dealing demand that, in so far as it is possible, the acquisition of this character of property should be placed in the power of as many of our citizens as can well be done. This is not only a matter of justice, but of sound policy, as it tends to prevent a monopoly of the coal interests in the hands of the few to the detriment of the consumers of coal. It was manifestly the intention of Congress in the act of March 3, 1873, providing for the sale of coal lands in the United States, to prevent this evil of monopoly. Under section 2347 the amount of coal lands individuals may enter is not exceeding 160 acres, and associations not exceeding 320 acres, and under section 2348 an association of not less than four persons, on certain conditions, may enter and acquire 640 acres. It is well known that notwithstanding the strict and well guarded provisions of the act of 1873, much of the coal lands have been acquired by corporations in quantities far in excess of the amount provided for by law.

Under the present system of disposition of these lands this result is absolutely unavoidable, and no provisions of law, however well guarded, can prevent it. It is utterly impossible that the Government can know beforehand what disposition a coal entryman will make of the property when his title shall have become perfect. Wealthy individuals and corporations can furnish the means with which to purchase the lands, and by a secret understanding the titles may be conveyed away as soon as patents issue and the jurisdiction of the Government ceases. This is not only possible but practicable, and experience shows that it is a probable result of the present system. In my opinion it would prove a great calamity to the whole country to allow any system to continue which would result in the accumulation in the hands of the few a monopoly of so imdispensable a necessity as that of coal. It would affect injuriously, if not disastrously, every material interest in the whole country. How to prevent this threatened calamity whilst it is yet in the power of the Government to do so is a question of the greatest moment.

The bill before me provides first for the survey of the public lands in the States and Territories containing coal lands, for locating, making, and keeping record of the same, and makes needed appropriation therefor.

The second section provides that coal beds thus discovered shall remain the property of the United States; that they may be leased for a term not exceeding twenty years; that no more than one lease shall be made to any one person, company, or corporation in any one county or district, and that no one lease shall contain in quantity exceeding 160 acres. and the third section provides that settlers on public lands shall have the right to mine coal for their own uses, etc.

In order to obtain all the light and information obtainable on the question, I caused a short note to be addressed to each of the representatives of foreign Governments in Washington, requesting them to furnish me with information as to the manner in which their respective Governments dispose of their mineral lands, and especially of coal land.

Prompt answers have been received from most of them, from which I gather the following:

In Costa Rica, mines, whether on public or private land, are granted to the person who applies for them to the proper offices. The grant is forfeited by stopping work for six months if before resumption of work another person applies for the grant.

In Mexico mineral lands are free (coal lands included) to any person who denounces them.

In the Belgian Government the Government does not work any mine under its immediate direction. The mineral lands (including coal) are neither leased nor sold. He who wishes or proposes to work a mine, whether on his own land or that of another, must apply to the Government for a license. The application is examined by the consul des mines, who makes a report on the case. If no other claim to the same ground appears the application is granted, and royalty is paid to the Government, which is rather a tax than a dividend.

In Austria-Hungary mines are partially worked by private individuals and partly by the Government under its immediate direction. The Government works all silver and gold mines. No such thing as a lease of mines is known.

The Spanish Government reserves the monopoly of its quicksilver mines. All other mines may be denounced by private parties and worked upon payment of a royalty to the Government.

In Corea mineral lands are the property of the Government, and may not be sold. They may be leased for an indefinite period, but the usual custom is to work the mines for a royalty, the per cent. paid to the Government being regulated by the nature of the deposit and the difficulty of working them.

In France the mines are disposed of by way of concessions, as set forth in the act of April 21, 1810.

In Japan they have not adopted any fixed rules with reference to the disposal and development of its mineral lands. There have been instances of sales of such lands to private parties, of leases, and of direct working by the government. The representative of that Government in Washington says: "I am inclined to believe on the whole that the system of leases will in future have the preference." Of the three principal coal mines in Japan, one, the Takeshima mine, near Nagasaki, belongs to and is worked by private parties; one, the Miike mine, in Kenshen, belongs to the Government, but it is worked by a company which has a lease from the Government for a term of years; and one, that at Horonai or Peronai, in Yesso, is worked by the Government. These three mines supply the greatest part of the coal for domestic consumption, as well as for export.

In Great Britain, so far as her representative knows, the Government does not own any coal property, but he says should it own any it would be worked by private individuals on lease, paying tonnage royalty of 5d. to 6d. a ton.

According to the Chilian code of laws relating to mines and mining, enacted November 18, 1874, and according to article 591 of the civil code, enacted January 1, 1857, the mines containing gold, silver, copper, platina, mercury, lead, zinc, bismuth, cobalt, nickel, tin, antimony, arsenic, iron, manganese, molydena, and precious stones belong to the person who discovers the same and represents the fact of discovery before the competent officers, following the rules set over in the code, whoever may be the owner of the land in which those mines are found.

The same rule is applied to mines lying in lands belonging to the Government. Coal mines and fossils not covered by the former specifications belong to the owner of the land. Building stones, sands, clays, limes, turbaries, marls, and other substances of the kind lying in lands belonging to the Government or municipal corporations can be worked by whoever may want to apply those substances for building, agricultural, or artistical purposes.

The Government or municipal corporations have nevertheless the right to make concessions of the same to private parties by means of particular agreements.

The Government has not at present and never has had (to the knowledge of her representative in Washington) any mines worked under its immediate direction.

It appears from the above that foreign nations have no one settled policy with regard to the disposition of mineral lands, nor has any one of them a uniform system. In our country and with our system of disposition of coal lands the trouble has been to prevent capitalists under color of law from absorbing these lands in such great quantities as to create monopolies. If the law as it now stands could be so amended as to effectually prevent the evil referred to it would be better to continue under the present system than to resort to a policy of leasing. In some cases it requires much capital to develop and successfully work coal mines, and it is to be feared that persons would be slow to invest in properties to which they do not get a fee-simple title. The term of twenty years when it expires would perhaps in some instances find the property just beginning to be profitable, and I fear that persons possessing the mining capital would not be willing to invest in property which might be taken away from them just as it was beginning to prove profitable. The people of the United States are accustomed to holding their lands in fee-simple, and any change from this method instituted by the Government is not likely to give satisfaction. Moreover it would in all probability be a matter of as much difficulty to prevent combinations and monopolies under a leasing system, as there is under the present law. On a consideration of the whole question I am unable to see how the leasing system could work well.

Very respectfully,

S. M. STOCKSLAGER, Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM F. VILAS,
Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO ATTEND GETTYSBURGH REUNION.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that the House take up and pass the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 178) granting leave of absence to certain persons employed in the service of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That all persons employed in the service of the United States who were present at the battle of Gettysburgh, either in the Union or Confederate forces, be, and hereby are, granted sufficient leave of absence, without loss of pay, to attend the reunion to be held at Gettysburgh on the 3d day of July next.

The amendments reported by the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service were read, as follows:

After the word "that," in the second line of the resolution, insert the words "the heads of Departments are hereby authorized to grant."

In line 6 strike out "be, and hereby are, granted."

Add to the resolution the words "such absence not to be taken from the allowance made by law."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The amendments as reported were agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I move to still further amend the resolution by striking out the words "either in the Union or Confederate forces;" so that it will conform to the Senate resolution.

Mr. SCOTT. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORT WALLACE MILITARY RESERVATION, KANSAS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent on behalf of the Committee on the Public Lands that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TURNER] may be recognized to bring before the House a bill for consideration, and which, I think, will occupy but a few minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Let it be read, subject to objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of any member to object to its consideration.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. I desire to ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Wallace military reservation in Kansas.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to present consideration of the bill.

Mr. LANDES. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman from Texas to yield to me long enough to submit to the House a proposition which may expedite the adjournment and lead to the final disposition of the tariff bill acceptably to the House and to the country.

Mr. MILLS. Very well.

Mr. KELLEY. Neither Chitty's Pleadings nor any other book indicating methods by which an issue may be reached has suggested a process by which a fairer or more direct issue could be made than that which has been made between the two political parties of this country, and been submitted for consideration to the people of the country by their respective conventions.

Thus the President sent us his message. The Democratic convention at St. Louis indorsed and approved it without qualification. The Republican convention at Chicago found nothing in it worthy of commendation, and the issue upon the doctrines of the message is perfectly clear and unmistakable. The Mills bill, as it is called, received the approval of the St. Louis convention, and the condemnation, as cordially expressed, of the Chicago convention, again making this issue perfectly clear.

The action of the members of the House favoring the bill and urging its adoption was approved at St. Louis, and the course which seemed fitting as a matter of duty to the Republicans, to contest every modification of the existing tariff attempted by the bill which the judgment of the Republicans of the House could not approve, was cordially indorsed at Chicago, thus presenting the same well-defined issue a third time.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman——

Mr. KELLEY. Hear my proposition first, and then I will submit to any interruption. I am not asking an immediate reply to my suggestion, nor does its presentation involve any of my associates in responsibility. I alone am responsible for submitting it to the consideration of the House. I believe that in submitting it to the consideration of gentlemen good results will flow from the proposition; but whatever be the result, I alone am responsible for my action. I repeat that whether we consider methods of action or results, the issue between the two parties is sharply defined and complete.

Now, sir, my suggestion is that the bill shall be laid over until the next session of Congress, with the understanding that if at the November election it shall be distinctly approved by the people the Republican party will withdraw its opposition. If, on the other hand, it is condemned unmistakably by the voters, that the bill shall not be further pressed.

This proposition leaves the question of the surplus undisposed of, and I have a suggestion on that subject which will require of the President's supporters a slight concession to the "condition that confronts us." It is that they shall allow the entire internal tax on tobacco to be repealed, and instead of making two bites of that cherry and repealing only about eighteen millions of the thirty-one millions derived from the internal taxes on tobacco, shall permit the entire repeal.

This is my personal proposition, and I beg gentlemen to consider it, and not require us to swelter here uselessly from now until the end of September.

Mr. MILLS. It is very true, Mr. Speaker, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the Democratic convention at St. Louis did indorse the measure presented to the House for a reduction of taxes. It is very true, as stated, that the Republican convention at Chicago has condemned this measure that has been submitted for a reduction of taxation upon the necessaries of life and proposed in lieu of it a reduction of the taxation on whisky. It is very true, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the issue is fairly and squarely made before the American people, and that the issue thus presented must be met in the coming campaign and decided in November next by the American people—whether they propose to reduce the surplus revenues of the Government, which are constantly increasing, by a reduction of taxation upon the absolute necessaries of life, or whether they will reduce that surplus by a reduction of taxation upon whisky.

Mr. SPOONER. Upon alcohol used in the arts.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, these things being true, as stated by the gentleman on the other side, it is somewhat remarkable that a proposition should be submitted from the minority side of the House to the majority, when the majority of the country have instructed their representatives to go forward and press this bill, not only to consideration, but to its final passage. The path of duty for us on this side of the House as the majority responsible to the people for the administration of the Government and for its legislation is plain. It is to press this bill in season and out of season until we reduce taxation unnecessary and unjust in its rates upon the necessities of life and relieve the surplus in the Treasury, and relieve the people from taxation.

Now, I have a counter-proposition to submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Inasmuch as we are the majority side of this House and his side is the minority side, if he has faith in the position which he and his party occupy, it seems to me it would be the part of wisdom to welcome us to the time when we vote on this bill and put ourselves on record upon it, so that they may use it against us in the coming campaign. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I therefore submit to him this proposition: That we will stop all this unnecessary talk, in the hope of obstructing the passage of the bill, and set an early day when we will take the bill up and put it upon its passage in the House. [Applause on the Democratic side and cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, the suggestion which was made on this side by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was very properly and distinctly declared to be an individual suggestion.

Mr. KELLEY. Entirely so.

Mr. REED. The Republican party have resolved by their properly-constituted assembly that they would give due and deliberate consideration to every item of this bill, believing, each man, that it was his duty to his constituency to explain and expose the errors of the bill. I desire here and now to repeat the asseveration that has been made in open day so many times: there has been no discussion here with any purpose of delay; nothing but an honest, fair discussion, fairly brought out by an attack, a political attack upon the industries of the United States of America. [Applause on the Republican side.] That attack has been met by facts and figures, and not by deluding phrases often repeated like "tariff taxes" and "taxes on the necessities of life." It has been met by arguments clearly showing that the good of the people of this country requires a system of protection; a statement backed up by history as well as it is backed up by argument. The Republican party of this nation have taken the ground before the country that the system of protection is valuable in itself, and not to be sacrificed, because it is for the interest and advantage of the American community. By that doctrine we will stand, and by that sign we will conquer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire in response to what has fallen from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to make any rhetorical, declamatory, or passionate reply, but I hope that we may reach some practical result this morning in fixing a day to take a vote. It may be as well understood now as at any other time that the majority of the Representatives of the people upon this floor intend to have a vote upon this bill, unless the 4th of March is reached by obstruction. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the gentleman from Maine is candid in his statement that nothing up to this point has been done for obstruction, which statement I accept as candid and also as a prophecy, and, so far as he can make it, a pledge that no obstruction shall be made in the future, surely we can reach some practical agreement.

This is an effort to reduce taxation. [Cries of "Oh, no!" on the Republican side.] Oh, yes; not oh, no. Oh, yes; it does reduce taxation. It does relieve burdens. It does take money that under the present system would go into the pockets of the favored classes and keep it in the pockets of the men who earn it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is not only its object, but that will be its effect.

The Republican party has announced that it will reduce, not the burden, but the revenue, by increasing the rates, if that be necessary, after reducing taxation by the repeal of the tobacco tax and the tax on alcohol used in the arts. Now, gentlemen, you have formulated your purpose into a platform. Formulate it into a bill. You have men of ability. Put your platform into the form of a legislative proposition. Let that proposition come to a vote. Let our proposition come to a vote. If your proposition carries, then it becomes an enactment of the lower House to go to the Senate. If ours carry, a Republican Senate has to take it into consideration. This is practical legislation. Can we not agree upon some proposition to carry the details of this proposed legislation, contrary in its principles, into practical effect? That is the question for this morning. Can not we agree upon it? Undoubtedly a certain amount of debate is desired by gentlemen representing various interests. We on our side want to be liberal. We have shown no spirit since this bill came to this House except a spirit of the utmost liberality. At the request of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and his colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means, the majority of that committee agreed to twenty days of debate, and when we were requested to extend that time we did extend it four additional days. We have made no attempt to limit debate on the other side. We desire to be liberal, but we desire it to be fully understood that with that liberality we intend to pass this bill if the gentlemen on the other side do not use obstructive tactics, and we intend to pass it if they do use obstructive tactics, unless they use up the time for which this House was elected by the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, with that frank understanding upon both sides, is it not possible for us to come to some practical arrangement by which a certain time shall be given for debate on the various schedules included in our proposition, and a time be fixed for the bill to be reported in such shape as the Committee of the Whole shall have put it, so that it may be voted upon in the House?

This seems to me to be what we ought to do this morning. Any time that the gentleman will suggest and any amount of debate that he will suggest will be considered by our side, but it does seem that we ought to be able to reach a conclusion by giving to the remainder of this bill ten legislative days. If that is too little time, gentlemen of the other side, say what in your judgment is a proper time. Let us deal with this as business men dealing with a practical business proposition, neither side being presumed to want to do anything except to submit to the House and the country a fair statement as to the items of the bill and to reach a conclusion at a sufficiently early day for the Senate to consider our bill and make its proposition to us either for concurrence or conference.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the observations of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. They have not surprised me, because they have been somewhat in line with propositions which he has hitherto made to us. His first proposition is that we shall formulate our views in a bill and present them to this House to be voted upon as a whole as against his bill as a whole. Now, if the gentleman had been anxious to state that matter accurately and carefully and fairly he would not have stated it at all. [Laughter.] There is an utter impossibility for a minority of a House of Representatives to propose a bill which can pass, simply because they are a minority. There is no method known to science by which a 5-foot plank can be made to span a 7-foot chasm. [Laughter.] If we should undertake to propose a bill which could pass this House it would have to be with such an abatement of Republican principle as would secure Democratic votes. For us to make a proposition like that would be simply absurd in view of the fact that we should be required to carry out such a proposition in the future; and for us to make it knowing that it can not pass would be to exhibit ourselves in a foolish dress-parade, which nobody is called upon to do. When the gentleman who now occupies the chair [Mr. CARLISLE] was the leader of the opposition to the tariff bill in the Forty-seventh Congress I never heard of his presenting a bill; I never heard of his side urging him to present a bill. On the contrary, he and his friends spent seven long weeks in discussing one-half of the bill, seven long weeks in discussing one-half the items. Whatever the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] may say as to his kindness of disposition toward us, it has been perfectly evident from everything he has said upon this floor that he has grudged us every minute of the discussion we have already had, and now he proposes that we shall fix a time for a vote.

Now, what is the object of debate? Is it to get over time; or is it, fairly and fully, like reasonable men, to discuss propositions and give reasons for and against? And upon what principle of fair discussion can you purpose to compress the entire business of a great country like this within ten legislative days without knowing what arguments may be urged for or what arguments ought to be urged against? Why, this bill has had no discussion elsewhere. When these gentlemen have been charged, as they have been charged repeatedly, with the suppression of discussion and of means of information in relation to this bill, when they have shut their doors against all the business interests of this country, they have replied, "There will be ample opportunity for discussion in committee;" yet we had hardly got into Committee of the Whole before they began to exhibit every symptom of impatience at discussion even here

They wanted to crush out this Republican minority in the same way that they have crushed out the Democratic minority on their side. But they will find that the people of this country have business interests involved here, which, however willing we might have been to make up mere political issues by accepting these questions in a lump, demand of us full, complete, and proper discussion. That we propose to give to the bill, but no more. We do not intend to adopt the tactics which were adopted in the Forty-seventh Congress, when the respectable gentlemen who managed the affairs of the Democratic party argued as long as it was respectable and then put other gentlemen up to do the rest. [Laughter.] You will find that all discussion on this subject will be in the future as it has been in the past, solely for the purpose of elucidating the questions and principles involved, so far as we are able to do so. I say to gentlemen on the other side, and I say to everybody whom my voice can reach, that there never has been an effort on this side since the beginning to induce any man to speak, to induce or cause any discussion. Whatever discussion has taken place has been spontaneous, arising out of the imperiled business interests of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution for immediate consideration. I ask that it be read for information.

Mr. KELLEY. We will hear the resolution read, reserving the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Of course it is read subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to report to the House a rule for the further consideration of the tariff bill, providing for stated times for votes upon the more important propositions, and fixing a day upon which the bill shall be reported to the House and put on its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KELLEY. I object.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons which prompted me to make the suggestion I did was because the suggestion had first been made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] himself. He and his colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means suggested that they would, as a last resort, offer a substitute. I hold in my hand the views of the minority of that committee as printed with the report of the majority. These gentlemen of the minority say that—

They sought by amendments in the Committee on Ways and Means to make this bill reasonable, just, and practical; failing there, they will seek to amend and modify it in the Committee of the Whole House, and if their efforts there are unavailing, they will seek as a last resort an opportunity to offer a substitute, which will assuredly diminish the revenues without any impairment of the American system of protection.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

What I was proposing to do was simply to offer the opportunity which these five gentlemen said they would seek as a last resort.

Mr. REED. We will seek our opportunity under parliamentary law.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. After they had tried the process of amendment and after it had failed, we proposed to aid them in getting the opportunity which they said they would seek. Notwithstanding the various adverbs which the gentleman used in charging me with having acted unfairly, I sought simply to offer the opportunity which he and his colleagues had publicly pledged themselves to the country and their party that they would seek to obtain. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say——

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes. This bill has been returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, it is very necessary that this bill should pass both Houses during the present week. I have examined the amendments; they are in general slight. I ask that the bill be printed with the amendments; that the House non-concur in the amendments, and ask for a conference with the Senate.

Mr. BURROWS. I think these amendments ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RYAN. It seems to me they should be examined by that committee.

Mr. FORNEY. The amendments are slight, and unless the bill be passed by both Houses during this week a resolution extending the appropriations for the present fiscal year will be necessary.

Mr. RYAN. We know nothing about these amendments whatever.

Mr. FORNEY. They appear in the RECORD of to-day as a part of the Senate proceedings. If the amendments be at once non-concurred in, and a conference agreed to, there will be no difficulty in getting the bill through by Saturday night.

Mr. RYAN. I think the committee can consider the amendments in the course of half an hour.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged matter. There being objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama, the bill with the amendments will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

TARIFF.

The question recurred on Mr. MILLS's motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue. The Clerk will read the pending paragraph, page 5, lines 89 and 90.

The Clerk read as follows:

Coal-tar, products of, such as naphtha, benzine, benzole, dead oil, and pitch.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Is not line 87 still pending, "coal-tar crude?"

Mr. RANDALL. And line 88, "aniline oil and its homologues," is pending.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Certainly line 88 is pending. Line 87 has not been voted on or passed from.

Mr. MILLS. It was passed from and not read this morning.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Those lines were passed from when the bill was under consideration before.

The CHAIRMAN. The recollection of the Chair is that when the House was in committee considering this bill these two lines were read and the House adjourned after reading line 88.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I move to strike out lines 87, 88, 89, and 90.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make the point that line 87 has been passed.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I make the motion to strike out the three lines, 87, 88, and 89.

Mr. MCMILLIN. As to lines 87 and 88, they have been passed by.

Mr. MCCOMAS. That can be settled by reference to the RECORD. I ask for the reading of the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the RECORD to be read.

A MEMBER. What page of the RECORD are you reading from?

The CHAIRMAN. It is page 5738 of the RECORD proceedings of June 15.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:
"Sulphur, refined, in rolls.
"Wood-tar.
"Coal-tar, crude."

Mr. FORAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole recur to line 77, to which I wish to offer an amendment. A gentleman came to my desk and asked a question at the moment the Clerk was reading that line, hence my attention was momentarily diverted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have declined similar requests so often that I do not see how I can assent in this case, though I very much dislike to be unable to oblige my friend from Ohio.

Mr. FORAN. I would not make this request but for the fact, as I have said, that a gentleman came to my desk and was asking me a question while the Clerk read the line. I think, under the circumstances, the gentleman from Tennessee ought not to offer objection to my request.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, objection is made.

The Clerk read as follows:
"Aniline oil and its homologues."

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, is objection made to my request?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have declined to accede to every similar request.

Mr. FORAN. It was through no negligence on my part that I lost the opportunity to offer the amendment when the line was read.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understand that.

Mr. FORAN. well, if there are to be no courtesies here—if there is to be an iron rule——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would rather suffer an injury than have any gentleman suppose me capable of being discourteous. The gentleman can make his proposition, and if no one else objects, I shall not.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the amendment which the gentleman from Ohio desires to offer?

Mr. FORAN. I move to strike out line 77, which reads:
"Iron, sulphate of, or copperas."

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is all that occurred. It is as I stated to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS]; line 87 had been passed and line 88 had been read.

Mr. MCCOMAS. In that way it occurred, and I stood here waiting.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It makes no difference in what way it occurred, the committee passed to the next paragraph.

Mr. MCCOMAS. No, we agreed to go back to line 77; the vote was taken on that, and when I came to make my amendment the committee rose.

Mr. McMILLIN. The point is that line 87 had been passed upon.
Mr. McCOMAS. No, it had not.
Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman's right to amend had been complete.
Mr. McCOMAS. At the moment the bill was read, but before I could get recognition, Mr. FORAN asked to go back to line 77. Consent was granted, and the committee did go back to line 77. The pending matter therefore before the committee is line 87, just as I have stated—"coal-tar, crude."
Mr. McMILLIN. The line was read and the gentleman never opened his mouth on the question.
Mr. McCOMAS. The gentleman himself was the one who objected to going back and then withdrew his objection, whereupon Mr. FORAN made his amendment to line 77 and was heard upon it. I stood here ready all the time to make my amendment to line 87, when the committee rose. I stood here as a Representative in my place waiting for Mr. FORAN to get through with his amendment to line 77.
Mr. McMILLIN. The point I make, and that is just what the gentleman ignores, is that line 87 was read and no amendment was offered to it. Line 88 was then read——
Mr. REED. To-day?
Mr. McMILLIN. And the only point at which an amendment could be offered would be at line 88. You could not go back to the other line without unanimous consent, and against that the point of order has been made.
In answer to the gentleman from Maine, I do not mean to say that the line was read to-day, but when this bill was considered before, on the 14th day of June.
Mr. REED. Because the moment the bill was taken up before the House to-day, I thought I heard the gentleman from Maryland make his statement.
Mr. McMILLIN. Yes, that is correct. What I referred to was the proceedings had on the 14th. The point I made was that the gentleman had no right to return to line 87, because that line had been passed, it having been read and no amendment offered.
Mr. REED. How long is line 88?
Mr. McMILLIN. It contains five words.
Mr. McCOMAS. Three words.
Mr. REED. That might have been passed entirely through inadvertence, being so short as not to attract any attention.
Mr. McMILLIN. But there had been five or ten minutes' debate over another matter after line 87 was read, in which time the gentleman from Maryland did not seek the floor, and after that line 88 was read.
Mr. REED. He could not have sought the floor if there was five or ten minutes' controversy.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the pending amendment is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], who by unanimous consent was allowed to return to line 77, and moved to strike out the words: "Iron, sulphate of, or copperas;" upon which a division was had, and no quorum appeared, and the Chair had ordered tellers.
Mr. McMILLIN. The Chair states correctly the status in that connection; and in courtesy to the gentleman from Ohio, who is not now in his seat, I ask unanimous consent that that status be permitted to remain, to return to it hereafter when the gentleman is present.
Mr. McCOMAS. I will only consent to that on condition that I can have the right to offer the amendment here, which the gentleman seeks to deny me.
Mr. McMILLIN. Very well; rather than wrangle with the gentleman all day I will withdraw the point of order.
Mr. McCOMAS. You are wise.
Mr. McMILLIN. I wish I could say the same for the gentleman.
Mr. McCOMAS. I mean to say it for myself.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that permission be given to recur to line 77 when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] is present?
There was no objection.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now entertain the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.
Mr. McCOMAS. My motion is to strike out lines 87, 88, 89, and 90.
Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will not make the motion so broad as that.
Mr. McCOMAS. Very well then; I will confine it to line 87, "Coal-tar, crude." Other gentlemen may want to object to the lines just read.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the lines under consideration are lines 87, 88, 89, and 90, which are now subject to amendment.
Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, of the bituminous coal product of this country last year, which was nearly one hundred and twenty-four millions, two and a half millions of it were devoted to illuminating gas. This is the product of coal distilled for the purpose of making gas. By this book, prepared by the Ways and Means Committee clerk, coal-tar, crude, has now a duty equivalent to 10 per cent. ad valorem, and there were imported last year 2,599 barrels. In that connection coal-tar products, such as naphtha, benzine, benzole, dead oil, and pitch, and by the provisions of the present bill all of its homologues, are admitted free, while at present there is a duty of 20 per cent. and the freight of 20 cents per gallon. The preparations of coal-tar, not colors or dyes, and not acids of colors or dyes, have a like duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem.
Now, this coal-tar is the residual product of the making of ordinary illuminating gas. It is made of the oily mixture formed by the ordinary distillation of coal in the making of the illuminating gas. In its separation in water the naphtha rises to the surface, while the dead oil is precipitated, and the residuum of the dead oil is the common substance known as pitch. Now, this substance, coal-tar, naphtha, and dead oil, and pitch, are the second stages of the coal-tar, crude, which is put upon the free-list, and when this naphtha is distilled it yields the oils benzole and toluole, from which when combined is made by conversion the aniline oils referred to in line 88. Now, this is a complicated process which I do not pretend to understand and further analyze, nor do I undertake to enlighten the House upon it very much.
But my main point is that in this country lately, in the large cities—Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and St. Louis—benzole, toluole, pitch, and dead oil are separated from each other by distillation, and benzole and toluole are converted into aniline and toluidine. Now, as to the consumption of these various products in this country, in 1886 2,150,000 tons of bituminous coal was used in the making of gas. From that coal 200,000 tons of coal-tar was produced. In the smaller towns and cities it is not yet a matter of great consideration what shall be done with these by-products of coal. In the older countries attention has been given to this matter. The result is that there comes from France to a small amount, from England to a greater degree, and very largely from Germany, competition with us in all the products in all of the stages to which I have adverted. The oils, naphtha, benzole, and the coal-tar, crude, all alike come in from Germany. If there be an infant industry in this country it is that of these by-products, under further analysis which has lately been established by three firms in this country. Some of the experiments in this country indicate that here is to be found the beginning of an industry which will make it unnecessary to bring coal-tar across from Germany, or any of the by-products, and give the industry to home work here. In competition with paving, with roofing, with tin, with all of the building material where it can be used, the products begin to show a possibility of home production which we all should guard. As you have rightly kept bituminous coal from the free-list, these by-products of coal and these oils ought also to stand where they now stand. Therefore I hope the amendment will prevail. But my time has expired and I can go no further.
[Here the hammer fell.]
The amendment was rejected.
The Clerk read as follows:

Coal-tar, products of, such as naphtha, benzine, benzole, dead oil, and pitch.

Mr. RANDALL. Line 88 ought to be read.
The CHAIRMAN. It has been read.
Mr. RANDALL. I desire to amend that line.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the amendment.
Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out the word "homologues."
Mr. TRACEY. I rise to a point of order.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. TRACEY. These three lines have already been considered.
The CHAIRMAN. That point has been passed upon.
Mr. RANDALL. I objected to their being considered together when the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] suggested it. I think the word "homologues" is entirely too indefinite to find a place on the free-list. Its meaning is in the nature of similitude. There is no objection so far as I know to having aniline oil on the free-list; but a word like this might mean a great deal more than is intended and might add to the now prevalent disputes in the custom-house which have caused so much litigation. It is my judgment that no article should go on the free-list unless it is specifically named or unless it is an article that is in its character carefully described.
The amendment was rejected.
The Clerk read as follows:

All preparations of coal-tar not colors or dyes, and not acids of colors and dyes.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to change the phraseology of those lines so as to make them perfectly explicit and well understood. I offer an amendment simply to change the phraseology of the paragraph.
The Clerk read as follows:

All preparations of coal-tar except colors and dyes, and except the bases and acids of colors and dyes.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I hope the committee, and especially the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], who has charge of this chemical schedule, will see it is much better instead of having negations to make this paragraph simply affirmative. There is no change in the sense. It does not change any of the articles. It simply makes the paragraph comport with the usual way it exists in the old tariff law. I hope the committee will agree to this amendment. It is merely verbal, and I think it is necessary in the construction of the law at the Treasuay Department.
The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Logwood and other dyewoods, extracts and decoctions of.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "extracts and decoctions of" in lines 93 and 94.

The Clerk reported the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, the duty on these extracts and decoctions is 10 per cent. ad valorem. The principal competitor we have is France. This small duty protects us against the French competition. The industry has about $10,000,000 invested in it, and employs many hundred men in different States. It is a comparatively new industry. I can see no reason for taking from these capitalists and workmen their employment in order to give it to France. I offer the amendment for the purpose of indicating the mistake that is made by striking this blow at that industry.

I ask that this letter from the representative of the manufacturers of dyewood extracts and decoctions be read and incorporated in my remarks:

The letter was read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 8, 1888.

DEAR SIR: We note with feelings of deep concern that in the proposed new Mills tariff bill the articles of extracts and decoctions of logwood and other dyewoods are placed upon the free-list.

Against this proposition we desire to protest, inasmuch as the present duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem is a small but necessary protection to this American industry.

The amount of revenue derived from the importations of this article is small, and the amount will not materially effect any great change in the proposed reduction of the revenue.

The present duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem is barely sufficient to offset the difference in price of labor between the United States and France, which country is our greatest competitor, and whose tariff laws exact so high a rate of duty as to make exportation from this country into that impossible—their rates being from 20 to 30 per cent. specific.

The amount of capital invested in this industry is about $10,000,000, and many hundreds of men are constantly employed.

The various manufactories are located in the following States, namely: Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland.

The duty is now and has always been small, but has been of value in developing the industry, which, if removed, will take away the proper offset in difference of labor between ours and the French, and will be of no material advantage to the proposed reduction in the revenue; neither will its removal be of any benefit to any other industry.

I would also call your attention to the proposed reduction on American sumac and sumac extracts. The latter is an infant industry, the oldest works having been established only a few years, and our own have been erected within a year. Both the raw and manufactured article are produced in this country, and we are obliged to compete with the foreign article imported into this country. We therefore are obliged to again protest against the proposed reduction of duty on these articles for the same general reasons and to the same general effect that we have applied to extracts and decoctions of logwood.

We therefore respectfully request your very best endeavors in our behalf, with both committee and in the House, in the direction above indicated, and we do this, not only from a personal interest, but for the general welfare of all the industries of the country.

Yours truly,

MARSHALL K. ABBOTT,

Representing the Manufacturers of Dyewood Extracts and Decoctions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, if nobody desires to oppose the amendment, I will move to strike out the last word. This proposition is in conflict with the high-sounding professions that heralded this bill to the country and the assurance that it was designed to secure "free raw materials." There is no country in the world that has such abundant raw materials as the United States for the extracts and decoctions enumerated in this paragraph. As near as I can learn, there are about $10,000,000 invested in the gathering of the materials and the production of these extracts and decoctions.

The present duty is not prohibitory, as we imported last year, in spite of our enormous home supply of these materials for their manufacture, 3,666,378 pounds. What are the materials? Logwood, which we do not produce; fustic, quercitron, sumac, oak, hemlock, and chestnut barks, all of which we do produce. The gathering of sumac alone, by women and children in Virginia and North Carolina, as I had occasion to say when we were on the bill before, amounts now to about a million dollars a year. It amounted to $500,000 in the days of the Forty-seventh Congress, and it is but one of the industries to be damaged or destroyed by this paragraph.

Put, if you please, these raw materials on the free-list; but leave undisturbed the manufactures and the capital embarked in the employment of many people North and South in the preparation of these extracts and decoctions. Live up to your boastful announcement:

We shall injure no industry, because we do not mean to affect any of them except beneficently by giving them free raw materials.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, these logwoods, dye-woods, extracts, and decoctions are dyes that are used in the manufacture of cloth. The gentleman [Mr. KELLEY] says they are not raw materials. They are materials that are used by the manufacturers of cloths, as the gentleman knows; and I remember very well that the manufacturers of woolen goods, when they were asking Congress to raise the duties on woolen goods to compensate them for the taxes they had to pay, brought in the dyes as one of the items, and, according to my present recollection, they charged that the additional cost to them was 2½ cents a pound on account of the dyes.

Mr. KELLEY. I never heard that statement from a manufacturer.

Mr. MILLS. Now, we want to remove the duty on these materials used by the manufacturers, so as to enable them to purchase their goods at a lower cost than they can now.

Mr. KELLEY. But these decoctions and extracts are not raw material. They are advanced manufactured products, though they be materials for more highly advanced manufactures.

Mr. MILLS. But at the same time they are raw material for something else.

Mr. KELLEY. No, they are not. That which is cooked, as these extracts and decoctions must have been, is never raw material. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. Provided it is cooked done.

Mr. KELLEY withdrew his formal amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. LODGE, and it was rejected—ayes 51, noes 57.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After line 94 insert the following:

"Alizarine, natural or artificial, and other dyes and colors produced from anthracine."

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because alizarine colors or dyes were intended to be made free in the last tariff act. "Alizarine, natural or artificial," was then made free. Since that time three additional colors of alizarine have been added to the list, but those colors, under a decision of the Treasury Department, are not included under that law. Consequently we have the anomaly of five colors made of alizarine that are admitted free, and three colors, orange, brown, and blue, that are dutiable by the decision of the Treasury Department.

This amendment is for the purpose of clearing up this matter and admitting free, as was intended in the passage of the existing tariff act, all colors of alizarine. No colors manufactured from anthracine are made in this country; all such colors are manufactured abroad, and the duty upon them is a tax which falls upon all calico printers and manufacturers of fine worsted goods. I offer this amendment in the interest of manufacturing alone.

Mr. MILLS. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Spirits of turpentine.

Bone-black, ivory drop-black, and bone-char.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend by striking out the line last read—

Bone-black, ivory drop-black, and bone-char.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ocher and ochery earths, umber and umber earths, sienna and sienna earths, when dry.

Mr. JACKSON. I move to amend by striking out the lines last read. We have in this country the earth and the raw material (if that name can be properly applied) sufficient to furnish all of these articles that we can possibly need or use. Their manufacture is a business in which there is at present a very considerable amount of capital employed and which gives occupation to a large number of persons. It is a comparatively new but growing industry, and sufficient has already been developed in this line to show that we can very readily produce all that we need of these colors for the manufactures for which these earths are used.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

All preparations known as essential oils, expressed oils, distilled oils, rendered oils, alkalies, alkaloids, and all combinations of any of the foregoing and chemical compounds and salts by whatever name known, and not specially enumerated or provided for.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move to strike out the paragraph just read and insert the following in lieu thereof:

Olive oil, salad oil, cotton-seed oil, whale oil, seal oil, and neat's-foot oil.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "neat's-foot oil."

Mr. BUCHANAN'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

All barks, beans, berries, balsams, buds, bulbs, bulbous roots, and excrescences, such as nut-galls, fruits, flowers, dried fibers, grains, gums, and gum resins, herbs, leaves, lichens, mosses, nuts, roots, and stems, vegetables, seeds, and seeds of morbid growth, weeds, woods used expressly for dyeing, and dried insects, any of the foregoing which are not edible and not specially enumerated or provided for.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to amend by striking out in the paragraph just read the word "mosses." Whilst I am aware that there are some mosses imported into this country which are not grown here, and which might very properly go upon the free-list, other mosses which are imported come into direct competition with some of the agricultural products of my own district and other parts of the country. I offer this amendment at the request of a constituent of mine, who is to-day a prominent Democrat in his locality, an office-holder by the grace of his party, and an extensive farmer.

The importation of a coarse kind of moss has become very great in the last few years. It is used as bedding for horses in cities, and has come directly into competition with the straw of the farmers adjacent to our cities. As this importation thus comes in direct competition with the agricultural production of my own district and other parts of the United States, I have offered this amendment at the request of this constituent of mine, and in the interest of the agriculturists of the country.

The CHAIRMAN (having put the question on agreeing to the amendment) said: The noes seem to have it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I call for a division. I want to see where the friends of the farmers are.

The question being again taken, the amendment was disagreed to; there being—ayes 41, noes 57.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out the pending paragraph and inserting what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Drugs, such as barks, beans, berries, balsams, buds, bulbs and bulbous roots and excrescences, such as nut-galls, fruits, flowers, dried fibers, and dried insects; grains, gums and gum-resin; herbs, leaves, lichens, mosses, nuts, roots, and stems; spices, vegetables, seeds aromatic, and seeds of morbid growth; weeds and woods used expressly for dyeing—any of the foregoing which are not edible and are in a crude state, and not advanced in value or condition by refining or grinding, or by other process of manufacture, and not specially enumerated or provided for.

Mr. RANDALL. The provision of law from which this paragraph on the free-list is taken applied only to such articles now there known commercially as drugs. In previous acts the words "drugs, such as" avoids litigation——

Mr. MILLS. By this you name them specifically.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. You say "such as"——

Mr. RANDALL. I say "drugs, such as." It is taken from the existing law.

Mr. MILLS. I know it is.

Mr. RANDALL. It refers to articles commercially known and designated as drugs, and this makes it plain.

Mr. MILLS. You may include things out of which drugs are made.

Mr. RANDALL. It will avoid confusion.

Mr. MILLS. Of course these would be admitted, but others also might be admitted.

Mr. RANDALL. This is the language of the existing law; and the prefix in the law is "drugs."

Mr. MILLS. This makes it clear. It does not amount to anything.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

All non-dutiable crude minerals, but which have been advanced in value or condition by refining or grinding, or by other process of manufacture, not specially enumerated or provided for.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph because in my judgment it embodies legislation of the most vicious character. Here is used language which in the hands of a dishonest official might be subject to grave abuse. Now, what is the proposition? To admit free of duty "all non-dutiable crude minerals, but which have been advanced in value or condition by refining or by other process of manufacture." By refining—to what extent or in what manner? How much labor shall be expended upon them? And, as if this general provision was not enough, there is added the other alternate, "or advanced in value by any other process of manufacture." The words are "by any other process of manufacture." Under this provision almost anything can come in which has not reached its final perfected state of manufacture.

Mr. BYNUM. It is a mere transfer to the free-list from the law as it now is, and without any design whatever such as has been attributed to it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. This is from the old law. Now, the revenue derived from the articles enumerated in this paragraph was $140,000. The gentleman from New Jersey is correct. It places these articles on the free-list, which now pay 10 per cent. ad valorem. Unless there are good reasons for it I think, as a matter of safety, they should be retained at the present rate of duty. It covers over one hundred and fifty articles.

It does seem to me it is too general legislation, and $140,000 a year does not amount to a very large reduction in the revenue. It keeps us from competition in my district.

Mr. MILLS. It is the law, and the language is used to distinguish one class of dutiable articles from another. I have never heard any complaint that articles escaped from a higher to a lower class by the use of this language.

Mr. FARQUHAR. It is the old law.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The words "not herein specially enumerated or provided for" apply not to the old law but to this bill, and to put these articles upon the free-list extends the list far wider than would seem to be the case at first glance. I am satisfied it goes further than the gentleman from Texas or the committee designed. If the words "not specially enumerated or provided for by the law of 1883 or this bill" were inserted then the result would not be more harmful than the old law.

But in any bill which has only partial schedules, to make a general provision of this sort is to make the scope of the provision far more reaching than in the case of a law where the schedules are much fuller, and consequently fewer articles are left to be embraced by the general clause. In this bill the schedule of articles of this character particularly named is short, and consequently the general provision "not elsewhere provided for" will include many more articles than it would were the schedule as full as in the old law. That is the point I am making.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

The question being taken on the motion to strike out the lines, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

All earths or clays unwrought or unmanufactured, China clay or kaoline.

Mr. MILLS. I move to strike out line 117.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would be very glad to have the gentleman give some reason for making this change.

Mr. MILLS. I will be entirely frank with the gentleman. We propose to restore this article to the dutiable list, when we reach the same, hereafter, with, however, a reduction of the duty.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to return to line 74.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, to strike out line 117.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia. I renew my request for unanimous consent to return to line 74, in reference to which I wish to submit a motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I think it is not a good practice, and I shall have to object.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I offer an amendment to come in after line 117.

The CHAIRMAN. That line has been stricken out.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Then I offer it to take the place of line 117.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Glass plates or disks, unwrought, for use in the manufacture of optical instruments, spectacles, and eye-glasses.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The tariff act of March 3, 1883, scheduled glass plates or disks, or plates unwrought, for use in the manufacture of optical instruments, as free. No such glass or disks of glass as are referred to in that paragraph of the schedule are made in this country at all.

The glass imported for this purpose is in a rough, unwrought shape, about 1.7 inches by 1½, and are all finished and ground in this country. Under the law here passed the Treasury decided that spectacles and eye-glasses were not optical instruments, although Mr. Noah Webster, Sir David Brewster, Dr. Lardner, and all of the principal writers upon the subject of optics hold that they are such, and consequently the intention of Congress in this provision of the act of 1883 was nullified by a Treasury regulation.

This amendment, I will state, as offered, is entirely acceptable to the officers of the Treasury, and it includes rough disks for the use of the spectacle and eye-glass makers, none of which disks, as I have said, are now made in this country.

Mr. MILLS. I have no objection to the proposed amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. Is that proposed as a substitute for line 117?

The CHAIRMAN. No; line 117 was stricken out. This is proposed as an amendment to the bill to come in in place of line 117.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Opium, crude, containing 9 per cent. and over of morphia, for medicinal purposes.

Iron and steel cotton ties or hoops for baling purposes, not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, if my friend from Pennsylvania will allow me a moment, I wish to submit a request to the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I have an amendment that I desire to offer to the preceding lines.

Mr. BURROWS. In one moment. I merely want to ask unanimous consent that this item expressed in lines 120 and 121 may be passed over informally until to-morrow. Mr. MCKINLEY had this matter particularly in charge, and will be here to-night.

Mr. MILLS. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, these lines will be informally passed over until to-morrow.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to offer an amendment to lines 118 and 119, to insert, after the word "crude," the words "and not adulterated."

Mr. MILLS. I have no objection.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will withdraw the objection I made a few moments ago to the request of the gentleman from Virginia to recur to line 74.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read line 74 again.

The line was read, as follows:

Baryta, sulphate of, or barytes, unmanufactured.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia. I move that line 74 be stricken out.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman explain why? It is a free raw material, as I understand it, and a very raw material at that.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia. My reason for asking is this, that in my district I have considerable interest in this product [laughter on the Republican side]; of course I am like gentlemen on the other side, a little selfish in this matter. I hope the amendment will be adopted. I will say that this is quite a rough material, and when ground is used in paints exclusively.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask if the gentleman did not vote against protecting the farmers' straw in my district?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia. I voted in reference to the question of moss, if that is what the gentleman means.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask, with permission of the Chair, whether barytes is not an element used in the adulteration of paints?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia. It is used, I understand, in paint in the place of white lead.

Mr. KELLEY. A very bad adulterant; a substitute for white lead in no sense or wise connected with it or related to it. It is a mere means of cheating the consumers of cheap paint.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia. They have no business to use cheap paint.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not object to the line being stricken out; because it is a great industry, adulterant as it is, in the gentleman's district in Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Needles, sewing, darning, knitting, and all others not specially enumerated or provided for in this act.

Copper, imported in the form of ores, regulus of, and black or coarse copper and copper cement, old copper fit only for remanufacture.

Antimony, as regulus or metal.

Quicksilver.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out line 128. During the general discussion of this bill I submitted some remarks to the House in relation to this item. I therefore do not desire to take up the time of the House in repeating myself; but I desire to briefly supplement what I said on that occasion, as one of the most important industries of the district I have the honor to represent is the production of quicksilver. The source of its production in the United States is confined to the State of California; its chief production is within my, or the Fifth, Congressional district. Sir, there is no item on this free-list that occupies the peculiar position that does the production of quicksilver. The facts are that the sources of its supply are practically but three: the Almaden mine of Spain; the Idria mine of Austria, and the New Almaden mine of California, before referred to.

It is a well-known fact to those who are conversant with this subject, or the production of this metal, that the Almaden mine in Spain and the Idria mine in Austria are owned, controlled, and worked for the account of their respective governments; that they are remarkably rich; that they can and are producing this metal at about one-quarter the cost that we can produce it. The price of labor is about one-fourth of that paid in California in this industry (there is probably no such scale of wages paid in the aggregate in any of our home industries); the ore of the foreign mine is from five to ten times richer than ours at the present time; their ore-bodies are more compact and homogeneous, thus enabling them to work almost all of the rock mined, while those of California lack these important requisites to cheapness. At the time of the first production of this metal in California it was selling at $1.50 per pound; since the production in California it has been reduced to less than one-half dollar per pound. The mines in California at the present time are not a bonanza.

As I before remarked, its cost of production is about four times that of the European. In connection with the remarks I made and before referred to I submitted a table of the production and prices of this metal during the time it had been produced in California, from which any gentleman who will take the trouble to examine will observe that the production of California has ruled the price throughout the world during the whole time of its production, save and except that time when no duties were levied upon it, to wit, from 1874, when it was put upon the free-list, to 1883, when the tariff was restored. An examination of those statistics will show this state of affairs: that during that entire time, year by year and month by month, quicksilver invariably sold for a higher price in the London market than it did in the American market, varying, of course, in degree, and at one time bringing a price of from $24 to $25 per flask greater in the London market than it was sold for in the American, and during all that time large exports were made to the United States from London, the product of the Spanish and Austrian mines.

Another striking fact is developed that during the interim between the passage of the act of 1883 restoring the tariff on quicksilver and its taking effect nearly as much was imported into the United States as was imported during the nine previous years; and here we observe the conservative policy of the Austrian and Spanish producer. While commanding and protecting the market other than the United States they produced and exported to the United States a surplus, manifestly for the purpose of breaking down the industry within the United States.

Now, sir, quicksilver is a metal which has no equivalent. Nothing takes its place in the arts or mechanical uses. Just in proportion as the industries of this country grow, in that proportion is the use of quicksilver required. I have no doubt, and though I have not the statistics and can not prove it or positively make the statement, I believe that the United States is the largest consumer of this metal.

Now, I submit to this House these facts, that practically the only other producers, and consequently competitors to the United States, are the Spanish and Austrian Governments. Their policy has ever been conservative; that whenever possible they have taken advantage of the laws of this country to give them a monopoly of the production, they have sold their products at higher prices at home and sent their surplus here to be sold at less prices. I believe the present tariff is not sufficient to promote and develop the quicksilver industry of this country as a competitor to the foreign production; and I think I hazard nothing in saying (and it is my honest opinion) that if the present tariff, small as it is, is removed, taking into consideration the conditions and advantages of the European producers as against those of the United States and the poverty of the American ores at the present time, this industry will be suspended or annihilated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORROW was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. FELTON.

Mr. FELTON. As I was about to remark, taking into consideration the fact that the only sources outside of the State of California are the mines controlled by the Governments of Austria and Spain; taking into consideration their uniform policy of husbanding their resources; taking into consideration the vast amount of ores that they have still in store, this article should not be put on the free-list.

It is said in the Spanish mines there is a sufficient quantity of ores to supply the present yearly output for fifty years; that the New Idria mine has in store already developed a quantity of ore equal to one-half of the production of California for the last thirty-seven years. I submit to this House that if the California production is discontinued—and I believe upon my honor it will be if the tariff is taken off—will the consumers be benefited? I can see no mode or means by which the consumer of this country can be benefited; and I believe the price will be twice what it is now.

If the object of the gentlemen on the other side (and I believe that to be the case) is to furnish necessary articles to the consumers of this country as cheap as possible, the only way they can do it in this instance is by taking this item from the free-list, which I sincerely hope will be done, and restoring the duty to 10 cents per pound instead of 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Spain and Austria have protective duties upon this article. They both protect their own industries so that we can not export the article into those countries without paying a tariff duty——

Mr. BURROWS. I ask to have read the extract which I send to the desk, to show that the proposition to put this article on the free-list is in the interest of a foreign trust.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Rothschilds are at the head of a quicksilver "trust" which controls all the output of that metal save that which is produced in the United States. A 10 per cent. duty has prevented them from deluging our market to a degree that would make profit impossible to our mine owners, and then purchasing their unprofitable mines cheaply and regulating the price over all the earth.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. We are large exporters of quicksilver, having exported in the last fiscal year over 500,000 pounds of that commodity.

Mr. FELTON. The United States?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes, sir. Our imports during the same year were six hundred and ninety-three thousand and some odd pounds. Thus it appears that our exports nearly keep pace with our imports.

Mr. FELTON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman had his time extended, but I will hear his question.

Mr. FELTON. Does that embrace the exports from San Francisco?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I speak of the exports from the United States. Some of our exports are made to Quebec. Some of the exports of our domestic product are made from the Atlantic seaboard, but we export largely to Guatemala and principally to Mexico. Our quicksilver is able to enter the Republic of Mexico upon an equal footing with the foreign quicksilver and to command that market by sales almost as great in extent as our imports from foreign countries.

It is perfectly clear that our producers have got the whole East at their command, and when they are able to export and undersell the foreign producer in the countries I have named, it is not proper that we should hold our consumers of quicksilver along the Atlantic seaboard in unnecessary bondage in order to control for the producers an unnatural and unnecessary market. Therefore, putting this upon the free-list justly hurts nobody. If there be a trust in Europe, that fact lays no just or proper basis for inaugurating a corresponding trust in America. Our friends upon the other side seem to think that if they can by any means claim or show that there is a trust abroad, then it follows that we should inaugurate a trust at home.

Mr. FELTON. I do not say that there was a quicksilver trust abroad, but I said there would be one.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. There is no need for a tariff on quicksilver, either for revenue or for any other reason.

Mr. FELTON. In reply to what the gentleman has said, I think that if he will examine the exports from San Francisco he will find that our quicksilver producers export to China, Mexico, and perhaps to South America, but he will find that the volume of that export is not very large. If the gentleman knew the cost of transportation from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast he would soon discover why so little of the product comes here. The only legitimate exports of quicksilver that we of the Pacific coast have at the present time are to China, South America, and Mexico.

California has produced more quicksilver than she and the rest of the Pacific coast could consume; but notwithstanding that, much has been imported into this country because it can be brought from Spain and from Austria at less cost for transportation than it can be sent from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast. Now, if we have no quicksilver production upon the Pacific coast, what will be the result? As I remarked before, I prepared a table of statistics which any gentleman can examine, and when he examines it he will discover that just in proportion to the production on the Pacific coast its increase or its diminution have been the fluctuations in price.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. But what makes the gentleman think that he is not going tc have that industry in California?

Mr. FELTON. Because it costs $28.30 to make a flask of quicksilver in California, while it costs in Spain only $7.10; and also because they have cheaper transportation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then why do not they drive you out of the Mexican market?

Mr. FELTON. Because it is more convenient for them to buy of us, because our freights are less, as the steamers leaving San Francisco for China and the South American ports do so practically in ballast, returning with cargoes of teas and rice from China, coffee and other products from South America; because the transportation takes less time, and perhaps because the demands of those markets for this metal are too limited to be worth contending for.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. It is because you have control of the situation and hold it, and year in and year out you go down to Mexico and Guatemala and sell great quantities of your product. Now, if the foreign producers can not drive you out of Mexico they can not drive you out of California.

Mr. FELTON. In reply to that I have to say they can by reducing the price here, and free quicksilver would accomplish that. Ten years ago we had thirty mines producing quicksilver in California, while two years ago we had but nine, and now——

We have but one principal mine having a large production, and that is in a very poor condition so far as the ores are concerned. Taking the present prices of quicksilver—about $37 a flask—I believe that putting quicksilver upon the free-list will be the straw which will break the camel's back. I desire gentlemen to remember that if the result should be to crush this American industry, every branch of manufacture which requires quicksilver will be compelled to pay twice as much for it as it does now.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. As these manufacturers are able to get along in selling to the Mexicans, I do not see why they can not command the market nearer home.

Mr. FELTON. The gentleman, I presume, did not hear my statement that during the entire time quicksilver was on the-free list—during every month of those nine years—it sold at vastly larger prices in London; always higher than in the United States.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then how are you going to be broken down?

Mr. FELTON. Because they could make their profits abroad and undersell us here, as during the interim between the passage of the law imposing the duty and its taking effect as much quicksilver almost was imported and sold in this country as in the nine years before of no protection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I am unable to see how an increase in the price of quicksilver is going to break down the market of the gentleman's constituents.

Mr. FELTON. I am very sorry I can not make the gentleman see it.

Mr. MILLS. Let us have a vote.

Mr. LODGE. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last two words. I merely wish, in behalf of certain constituents of mine who are interested in the quicksilver industry, to put upon record their protest against this attack upon that industry. Without delaying the House, I will simply read a letter from the treasurer of the Napa Consolidated Quicksilver Mining Company, which states the case very fairly:

THE NAPA CONSOLIDATED QUICKSILVER MINING COMPANY, TREASURER'S OFFICE, 23 MASON BUILDING,
Boston, April 11, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Among other articles put upon the free-list by contemplated new tariff bill is quicksilver, which, as you are well aware, is produced to a considerable extent in California. The only other places where it is produced in large quantities are Spain, at the "Almaden," and Austria, at the "Idria," which are controlled by those Governments, the Almaden being leased to the Rothschilds at present. The mines in California have had hard work since 1883, when the rate was reduced to 10 per cent., to run and pay expenses, and a small reduction in the price would compel them to close down and give up the business, which at present gives employment to a large number of miners.

The above company since 1884 has had a hard struggle to keep above water, but by the building and maintaining of an improved and expensive plant and costly machinery and furnaces has at last succeeded in getting a small margin of profit, which, if our reform-tariff friends prevail, will to a great extent be swept away. As a real American industry, in competition with cheap labor in Europe, and affording a good livelihood here to a large number of people, it would seem that it has some claim to recognition. The expense of closing down and refiring is large, and once closed down the mine owners would be reluctant to start up again, and the foreign article could be easily advanced to an exorbitant figure, while the small margin now allowed permits the mines to be worked at very close figures, and really benefits the consumer. As the Napa Consolidated is owned and operated entirely by Boston capital and people, and as you yourself were once cognizant of its affairs, I have taken the liberty to call your good services into requisition, and beg that you will give the matter your attention, and see that the duty is not taken off.

I am, dear sir, yours, very respectfully,

W. B. BUCKMINSTER,
Treasurer and Manager.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, Washington, D. C.

I also submit as a part of my remarks the following:

Memorial of the quicksilver manufacturers of California.

To the President and Members of the Tariff Commission:

The undersigned, quicksilver manufacturers in the State of California, respectfully beg leave to submit to your honorable body that the production of quicksilver is one of the most important interests of the Pacific coast, representing a capital of $30,000,000, and giving permanent employment to more than five thousand men, who are paid liberal wages; that the article of quicksilver is an absolute necessity in the mining of silver and gold, and other uses; that for many years while the article was protected by a duty the business was fairly profitable and remunerative to the manufacturers, and that some thirty mines were in operation in the State.

That within the last few years, since the abolition of the duty, owing to sharp competition with foreign producers, particularly of the Almaden mines in Spain, which are owned and worked by the Spanish Government, and the Idria mines in Austria, owned and worked by the Austrian Government, the price has been reduced to so low a figure that there is no profit to manufacturers here; that only eight mines are now being worked in California, and that the total amount received for sales of the article during the last three years has not paid the cost of its manufacture, allowing for depreciation in works and exhaustion of mines; that owing to the richness of the Spanish and Austrian mines, and the fact that the cost of labor in those countries is not more than one-sixth of what is paid in California, quicksilver can not be manufactured in America to compete with the product from Spain and Austria, and unless some relief or protection is given, this important interest must entirely give way to foreign competition; that owing to the high rates of transportation between California and the Eastern States, foreign quicksilver can be sent from Europe to New York at one-quarter the freight and in one-third of the time that it can be sent from San Francisco; that many articles necessary for the working of quicksilver mines, particularly iron and steel, are subject to high duties, thereby largely increasing the cost of manufacture; that empty quicksilver flasks are subject to a duty of 35 per cent.; that most of the flasks used in California are second-hand flasks returned from China, on which the quicksilver manufacturers here are obliged to pay the high duty, often paying many times on the same flasks, while new flasks filled with quicksilver are imported into New York free of duty; that owing to these facts, all of the American market east of the Rocky Mountains has been lost to home manufacturers, and supplied with a foreign product which pays no duty or revenue to our Government.

1883—Duty imposed on quicksilver, 10 per cent. ad valorem.

1888—New tariff bill puts quicksilver on free-list.

That the imposition of a duty on quicksilver would lead to no hardship or damage to other industries in this country, the article being used over many times in gold and silver mining, so that the small advance in price would practically be almost nothing in the cost of mining, while the only other industries which would be affected—the manufacture of vermillion and the manufacture of medicinal preparations from mercury, both of which are small in comparison with the manufacture of quicksilver—are now protected by a duty.

That owing to the great extent and richness of the Spanish mine, as compared with any mines in this country, and the low rate of labor in Spain, the Spanish Government can at any time produce quicksilver in sufficient quantities to supply the consumption of the world, and at a price which would close every mine in this country; that the control of this Spanish product is a practical monopoly in the hands of Messrs. Rothschild, of London, who have a lease of the Spanish mines for thirty years, to secure the payment of a loan to that government; that there is a very large accumulation from the products of these mines now in London; that prior to the manufacture of quicksilver in California the price of foreign quicksilver was more than treble the present price, and that, should the California mines, which are practically the only competitors of the Spanish and Austrian mines, be, for want of protection, driven from the field, the price of the foreign article would be advanced to a rate that would compel the consumer of quicksilver in this country to pay a hundred-fold more than the imposition of a duty on the American product would cost them. The admission free of duty of a product manufactured exclusively by foreign governments (which themselves have a high protective tariff), to the detriment and ruin of an American industry, is an anomaly in our revenue laws which your petitioners beg may be at once removed.

Your petitioners further respectfully represent that all other metals of American manufacture, from native ores, iron, copper, zinc, nickel, lead, etc., are protected by high duties; quicksilver, which under the present foreign competition seems to require it more than any other, forming almost the only exception; and they therefore trust that your honorable body will recommend the imposition of a duty on this article.

Under the old tariff the duty on quicksilver was 15 per cent. ad valorem, and ranged in amount from 10 to 23 cents per pound, but your petitioners would respectfully suggest that a specific duty of from 20 to 25 cents per pound be recommended—20 cents being, in their opinion, about the lowest figure which would enable American manufacturers to compete with the Spanish and Austrian Governments, and give them a fair return for the capital invested.

Mr. HERBERT. Does the gentleman think that if quicksilver should be put on the free-list these establishments which now produce it will shut down and quit exporting quicksilver to Mexico?

Mr. LODGE. There is no large margin of profit in this business; and the destruction of the quicksilver-mining industry will put the supply of quicksilver for this country into the hands of government monopolies of Austria and Spain, controlled by the Rothschilds.

Mr. HERBERT. How will putting this article on the free-list prevent these American establishments from exporting to Mexico as they do now?

Mr. FELTON. I will explain that matter to the gentleman. The chief quicksilver-producing mine in California now is the New Almaden. The present price under the existing tariff leaves these manufacturers a profit of only $5 or $6 a flask. They work some 750 men, and their operations extend over a surface of country 5,000 feet one way and 6,000 feet another, and 2,300 feet deep, making the production very expensive.

Mr. MCSHANE. The gentleman must be mistaken in his statement as to the profit on a flask of quicksilver. It is $22 instead of $5 or $6.

Mr. FELTON. In a flask of quicksilver there are 76½ pounds.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORROW. I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague [Mr. FELTON] be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. FELTON. Quicksilver is selling for $37 per flask of 76½ pounds.

Mr. MCSHANE. I am sure the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FELTON. In what respect?

Mr. MCSHANE. I know what I am talking about. I know that quicksilver is being sold by Wells, Fargo & Co. in San Francisco at $50 a flask.

Mr. FELTON. I know that a month ago it was selling in New York and San Francisco at $37 a flask. It has ruled about that price for years. If the gentleman will take the trouble to examine the matter he will discover that my statements are about correct. I do not undertake in every case to speak with perfect exactness; I am talking about the average. If there is any one thing about which I am solicitous it is to state nothing here which I do not believe to be strictly true; if any statement of mine is inaccurate it is because I am mistaken, and I now state that for eleven years past the average of the highest prices (ignoring the lowest) has been about $35 per flask, and I have the statistics to prove it.

At the time I obtained my figures (and that was during this debate) this metal was selling at $37 per flask. That price does not leave a sufficient profit, because last year the cost of production was $28.38 per flask.

Now, the mining of this metal in the United States is under disadvantageous circumstances compared with the Austrian and Spanish mines. The amount the mine has been making for the last year or for the last two years has not been more than enough to pay the wear and tear, and will not now pay the interest on the plant in addition.

Mr. MCSHANE. I am not discussing as to the cost of production. I take the gentleman's statement that it costs $28 a flask, but I do say that it is selling to-day in San Francisco at $50 a flask; at that rate selling $100,000 worth.

Mr. FELTON. I understand it has been selling at the highest at $37 a flask. I have not heard of its selling at $50 a flask. I say if it is $50 now it will not remain that very long, and that there must be some especial reason for it.

Mr. MCSHANE. It is $50 a flask.

Mr. HERBERT. Let me call the gentleman's attention now to the question which I put to him. I admit the Government does compel the home consumer to pay these quicksilver manufacturers a bonus on what they produce, but this mine has no power to compel the Mexican consumer to pay for these quicksilver miners any bonus at all. How, then, will it affect the export of quicksilver to Mexico?

Mr. FELTON. That is the easiest thing in the world to answer. If we do not produce it we will not export it. At the present rates you will not export it because you will not produce it.

Mr. HERBERT. Under the present conditions you do produce and sell it in Mexico. If there were a repeal of the tariff why could you not produce and sell it in Mexico, where you have to compete with the production in other countries? Please explain that.

Mr. FELTON. I will explain it. We would not produce it because the Austrian and Spanish mines would ship their surplus to sell in this market at a less price than we could produce and break down our industry and get both markets. They have sold it for nine years at a less price here than they sold it in their own markets.

Mr. HERBERT. Why do they not send us their surplus? It is because you can produce it cheaper. There is no answer to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired, and if there be no objection the formal amendments will be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I move to strike out the last word, and I do so for the purpose of answering the question of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], which he put to the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON]. He asked what effect it would have upon our exportation to Mexico of quicksilver by putting this article upon the free-list. It would have this effect: The quicksilver industry, through the influence of the tariff, has become so great in this country and the competition has grown up amongst them to such an extent they have reduced the price of the article so that they can afford not only to sell it in this country in competition with what comes from abroad, but they can also ship it into Mexico and compete with the production there. They do that because they have a 10 per cent. tariff upon it. In that way they are enabled to build up an export trade. But the moment you take off the tariff you not only kill off the home trade, but you also kill off the export trade.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman's theory, then, is, by making the price of quicksilver higher in this country you thereby enable us to build up an export trade in that article.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. That is the theory upon your side of the House and that is the theory upon which you act; but let me say to the gentleman from Alabama that there is nothing in it. It is purely imaginary and not at all practicable.

The only difference, Mr. Chairman, is in respect of the wages of labor. There is nothing else in it under the sun. The business men here are just as good as they are in Europe or anywhere else. Our manufacturers are just as ingenious and just as successful as those in Europe. They can produce whatever can be produced elsewhere. The difference is, however, that here high wages are paid to labor, whilst in other cases it can be hired at the rate of 25 cents a day. The result of the adoption of free-trade doctrines in this country will be to reduce our labor to the same low rates. To that we are opposed. We favor the protection of our industries. We propose to keep up the wages that are paid our labor in this country.

Mr. HERBERT. Then your theory seems to be that the higher the wages you pay and the more it costs to produce the article the better you will be able to export the product for sale to the Mexicans. Is that it?

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. As I have already said, the question of labor is the principal one, and it is only right and just that when the product of our manufactures is brought into competition with the foreign product the difference in wages paid in this country and abroad should be made up by a proper rate of duties for the protection of our own manufactures. In that way we have seen that our manufacturers can not only afford to supply the article at a reasonable rate but at the same time to build up an export trade; otherwise we would not be able to carry on the manufacture to supply our own market or to supply the demand created by our export trade.

Why, let me refer the gentleman to the fact, as the result of the policy to which I am referring, we shipped calico over to Europe and sold it in London, Glasgow, and Liverpool in competition with the foreign fabric. It will be the same case with the production of quicksilver if we are only careful to provide wise legislation.

Mr. MILLS. It is the cost of transportation in which this production finds its protection. Ten per cent. does not give any protection against the Austrian production of quicksilver.

It is the enormous transportation charges overland from California to New York that gives it protection. The very fact, sir, that quicksilver is exported from California into Mexico, or into any other country where it is to come in competition with the same mineral from other countries, shows that it has this distance competition.

Now, it can be sold cheaper at the point where it is produced than anywhere else, because the producer has not got to pay the charge for transporting it to the open market, where it comes in competition with the productions from other countries. He can sell his quicksilver cheaper in California than he can sell it in Mexico; but we see that it is exported from California into Mexico, and is sold cheaper in Mexico than the quicksilver which is produced in Spain or Austria; and hence it follows as a matter of course that he must be able to produce it in California cheaper than it can be produced in Spain or Austria, and it does not suffer by competition and needs no such protection as gentlemen urge.

Let us have a vote.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr.

MILLS], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, says that there is not any protective duty in 10 per cent. on quicksilver; or rather, that it really does not protect the industry in California, because of the enormous railroad charges which this product has to meet in seeking the markets of the world. Why, God bless his soul, there are no railroad charges in that connection. The vessels that come to California for wheat, that come there for a cargo, come in ballast and they are very glad to have the quicksilver, and the heavy iron flasks in which it is imported, as ballast, and take it without charge.

There is no charge for the water transportation of the Rothschilds Italian and Spanish quicksilver of the Almaden and Idria mines, which they hold as mortgages from the Italian and Spanish Governments. There are no railroad charges whatever unless it be in getting the product to the seaboard in Spain or Italy; and then all is water carriage, where this very heavy and condensed article is gladly taken by vessels in want of ballast, that come by the hundred, not by the tens or scores, but which you will find lying in the harbor of San Francisco, and in the harbors of other wheat-growing countries, by the hundred, each one waiting a chance to get into dock and receive its cargo. So that the gentleman's calculation of railroad charges as a protection to the industry of producing quicksilver is utterly and entirely delusive.

Mr. MILLS. Now let us have a vote.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. FELTON to strike out the line, the committee divided, and there were—ayes 45, noes 49.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

129. Chromate of iron or chromic ore.

Mr. VANDEVER. I move to strike out this line 129.

In my district there is a very considerable quantity of this ore produced. It barely sustains its own under the existing tariff, and if it be put upon the free-list it will result in the obliteration of the entire industry in that State.

This mineral is found chiefly in the county of San Luis Obispo. Contracts have been made for the product of the mines. It is mined and shipped around the Horn to points on the Eastern seaboard. It is a business carried on within the limits of our own country. It is carried on by our own people, and it will be fatal to the prosecution of that industry and the production of that ore if it be put upon the free-list.

This ore, mined as I have said in California and carried around the Horn in vessels, is sold upon the Atlantic seaboard at a very close margin; and if you put it upon the free-list you offer a direct premium on the part of this Government to the producers of this ore on the other side of the water and discriminate against our own industries. And you can see, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, what an impression such a condition must have upon the minds of the people who are directly interested in that industry in this country. The motion I make, therefore, is a matter of equity. The revenue derived now is not much. I think the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means might very well consent under the circumstances to allow that to be stricken from the free-list and the duty to remain as under the present law.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, the ore mentioned in this paragraph of the bill is produced only in California, and in but three places in that State—San Luis Obispo, referred to by my colleague, in Placer County, and also in Del Norte County.

I find upon an examination of a petition which has been presented to the House and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means that chrome-iron ore is sold in the New York market at about $20 per ton. That, I take it, is about the average price from year to year. We produce in California 5,000 tons annually. The cost of this product is about $17 to $18 per ton. Now, the present duty is 15 per cent. ad valorem, which I believe is equivalent to about $3 per ton. The present proposition is to place this ore upon the free-list, and the removal of the duty as proposed will, of course, not only reduce the present price, but it will result in destroying the industry because it is impossible to carry on a business on such a narrow margin without the reduction of the rate of labor. The amount paid in earnings is not less than $100,000 annually.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the result of placing this ore on the free-list will be the destruction of the industry altogether. No ore can be produced in California and shipped to New York and sold at $20 a ton at the present rate of labor in California. By continuing this tariff you enable us to produce a large amount of ore annually for the benefit of the consumers and to pay large numbers of workmen good wages for their labor. The question is simply whether you will continue this labor or whether you will strike it down. If the article is placed upon the free-list it will, under the present conditions, put an end to the whole industry in the country.

The Chair put the question, and was in doubt as to the result.

Mr. MORROW. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it will be necessary to read the next line.

Mr. KELLEY. No; I want to speak on this line. We have not perfected this line yet. We have voted on one amendment, which was to strike out all of the line. I propose to further perfect it by striking out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well; proceed.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to know if gentlemen are aware and will be kind enough to tell me what the chief use of this chromic ore is? It is a raw material, they will say. Yes; it is. It is the raw material upon which a most important industry depends and which we could not establish until these three beds of chromic iron or chromic ore were found on the Pacific coast. It is the substance from which bi-chromate of potash is produced, by the transportation of which from San Francisco or other ports on the Pacific coast around to Baltimore and Philadelphia we have been enabled to reduced the price of bi-chromate of potash, which enters into our dyes and colors, so that we are now able to compete with British and Scotch manufacturers of high-priced colored cotton fabric by reason of our ability to work these chromic beds in California.

The duty is not by any means prohibitory, for last year, as is shown by the paper furnished by the gentleman, we imported 1,403 tons, of a value of $20,812. To remove the whole duty received would make no perceptible impression on our revenues, because it was $3,121. We are really, without knowing what we are about, playing the part of a bull in a china shop. We are destroying an industry on the Pacific coast, and thereby endangering the industries in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New England and affecting some of the finest of our textile factories.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; I withdraw it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mineral substances in a crude state and metals unwrought, not specially enumerated or provided for.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 130 and 131, just read. I do it for the reason that those lines reach further in their effect than I suppose the committee intended. That provision is copied in form from the old act, but in the old act it was provided that such substances should pay a duty of 20 per cent. In the old act the schedule of metals was full. There was but little left to be included under this proviso, whereas in the schedule in the present bill but few metals are specified. The proviso in the bill under consideration says:

Mineral substances in a crude state and metals unwrought, not specially enumerated or provided for.

Especially enumerated or provided for where? Why, in the bill under consideration. It thus admits to the free-list a large number of metals in the unwrought state that are not named in this bill specifically and that are not upon the free-list as it now stands. For instance, in the old schedule, of which these words are a part, I find that lead, nickel, zinc ores, argentina, and some other metals in an unwrought state are provided for, but in the schedule attached to this bill I do not find that they are provided for, though my examination has been hasty upon the spur of the moment. Therefore they would come in free under the provisions of this general clause. I do not believe the committee intended that to be the effect, because if they had I believe they would have been manly enough to say in so many words that these articles should go on the free-list. Therefore I move that these two lines be stricken out.

Mr. MILLS. There is no difficulty in my mind or in the mind of the committee as to the clearness of the language we have used. Where an article is not specially provided for either by existing law or by this bill it would come in under the free-list. "Not otherwise specially provided for" means either by existing law or by the law as changed.

But I would say to the gentleman from New Jersey that a number of gentlemen in the House have suggested some doubts about this language, and so the committee have prepared a clause to come in at the end of the free-list which will cover all these cases.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Upon that assurance, that a proviso will be presented which will beyond doubt or cavil cover this difficulty—because it is a difficulty—I am perfectly willing not to press my amendment at the present time, but I would like to hear the proviso read.

Mr. MILLS. I will read it to the gentleman now:

This act is intended and shall be construed as an act supplementary and amendatory to existing laws, and the rates of duty and modification of clauses, provisions, and sections herein specifically made are intended and shall be construed as a repeal of all clauses, provisions, and sections in conflict herewith; but as to all clauses, provisions, and sections in existing laws not herein specifically changed, modified, or amended, the rates of duty now existing shall be and remain in full force and effect.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am free to say that the language of that proviso is not satisfactory to me, because it speaks of rates of duty "not here specifically changed;" but this is specifically changed, and I submit that the very fact that it has occurred to several gentlemen that this language is doubtful shows that there is substantial ground for objecting to it, and for fearing that the "not otherwise specifically enumerated or provided for in this schedule" will be held by the court to apply to articles named in this schedule and to nothing else.

Mr. MILLS. Now, will the gentleman name the articles of which he speaks?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes, sir. I will withdraw my motion to strike out, and move to amend by inserting "except lead, nickel, and zinc."

Mr. BAYNE. And iron ore. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means where iron ore is enumerated in this schedule?

Mr. MILLS. It is enumerated in the existing law at 75 cents a ton duty.

Mr. BAYNE. Yes; but do you propose to leave section 41 still a part of the bill?

Mr. BYNUM. No; this will take its place.

Mr. BAYNE. Because if you do leave it in the bill you will have two conflicting propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. BAYNE. Why not accept the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN]?

Mr. BYNUM. Because it would make the meaning doubtful.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to insert "zinc, lead, and iron ore, and bituminous coal." The gentleman will find, on examining pages 20 and 21 of the bill, that "lead in pigs and bars," etc., pays a duty of 1½ cents per pound, and that zinc ores pay 20 per cent. ad valorem.

My contention is that with the provision now under consideration in the bill, "Mineral substances in a crude state and metals unwrought, not specially enumerated or provided for," the other products can do as well without a special provision as ore and coal can.

Mr. MILLS. But my friend will remember that iron and coal remain as they are under the existing law. We do not touch them at all in this bill.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, the others remain also.

Mr. MILLS. Coal and iron ore remain untouched at 75 cents a ton. But we have touched these others. The provision is in relation to "mineral substances in a crude state, and metals unwrought not specially enumerated or provided for." These are specially enumerated and provided for, one set of them by this proposed bill, and the other set in the existing law.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, as tens of thousands of men believe that by the circumlocutions of this bill their industries are to be ruined or injured, either by the decision of some Department clerk, or possibly by the decision of a court, why not protect them by using the language of the present law, "on bituminous coal 75 cents a ton," "on iron ore 75 cents a ton?"

Mr. MILLS. But I say to the gentleman that we have agreed in committee upon a provision which we will insert at the end of this bill, and which will make its meaning as clear as the English language can make it.

Mr. KELLEY. Like the gentleman from New Jersey, I listened to the reading of that proviso, and like him I did not think it was quite clear. I have no coal miners nor iron-ore miners in my district, but I am appealed to by thousands to have their rights made clear by a couple of lines in this bill, and I propose to amend this provision so as to say "mineral substances in a crude state, and metals unwrought not specially enumerated or provided for, except iron ore and bituminous coal."

Mr. WISE. I have as much interest in this subject as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY]. I shall not vote for his amendment, because I believe the amendment of the Committee on Ways and Means, which will be adopted by the House, will leave this subject free from doubt.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, this provision as it stands covers some articles which are not enumerated, and there are numerous other articles which, though not enumerated in the present bill, are to be found in the existing law. If you undertake to include in this provision any part of those, you simply make the construction of the provision more doubtful and difficult. For this reason the committee prefer a general repealing clause which will apply to the construction of this whole bill and leave it consistent. The adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would, I submit, only complicate matters and probably create doubt in the minds of the courts as to other items of equal importance.

Mr. KELLEY. Iron-ore is certainly a "metal unwrought;" bituminous coal from the mine is certainly a "mineral substance in a crude state." Now, by this bill metals unwrought and crude minerals are put on the free-list. I ask the committee to adopt an amendment excepting iron-ore and bituminous coal.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] may very courageously vote for the provision of the bill, and if he lives until next November, he may wish he had not done so. I know that I have heard from many iron-miners and coal-handlers of his district begging me to try by this simple phrase to have their industry protected.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman will allow me to say that I have heard from the people engaged in this industry in my district; and they are satisfied that I understand what I am doing. I propose that their interests shall be guarded so far as my vote can control the matter, and that iron and coal shall not be put on the free-list. I believe that the amendment of the Committee on Ways and Means will accomplish the purpose I have in view.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to ask gentlemen of the committee what mineral substances they mean by this language: "mineral substances in a crude state."

Mr. MILLS. Anything not elsewhere embraced specifically.

Mr. BAYNE. What are they?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman will find by referring to page 72 of the compilation of the existing tariff various articles enumerated—ashes of zinc, barytes earth, or ore in natural condition——

Mr. BAYNE. Oh, no; that is provided for here in this bill, in line 74—

Baryta, sulphate of, or barytes, unmanufactured.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That is another article altogether.

Mr. BAYNE. What other articles do you speak of?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I am simply reading the names of some of these articles not elsewhere provided for—

Black lead; British luster; crysolite; claystone; cobaltum or cobalt crystals; yellow metal manufactured—

"British gold," as some gentleman suggests—

Fining earth; gannister, crude; guhr; limestone, rough, for burning into lime; sheathing metal, old, and fit only for remanufacture.

Mr. BAYNE. That is equivalent to putting iron ore on the free-list.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This is not iron ore, however.

Mr. WISE. That is otherwise provided for.

Mr. BAYNE. The colleague and associate of the gentleman says it is not; that it is included in this proposition.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I say it is elsewhere provided for.

Mr. BAYNE. Why did you name it, then, as one of those substances included here?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I have not named it. I am naming these other articles.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman has mixed those which are provided for and those which are not provided for.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Just the reverse. I have been separating them.

Mr. BAYNE. What mineral substances will come in free under this proposition?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I have been reading a few of them.

Mr. BAYNE. You read one which you admitted would be equivalent to placing iron ore on the free-list.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I denied that expressly.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman mentioned sheet-iron, fit only to be remanufactured.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That is not one of these articles I have been reading.

Mr. BAYNE. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. "Sheathing metal," not sheet-iron. I presume it refers to such metal as is used for the copper bottoms on shipping—"sheathing metal, old, and fit only for remanufacture." I refer the gentleman to page 72 of the compilation of the present tariff.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. As an amendment to the amendment, I move to add after the word "for," in line 131, the following:

Provided such mineral substances and metals are not found or produced in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment so that if this bill should pass there may not be any conflict or difficulty arising from the language of this clause. Under the language as it stands at present almost any kind of metal can be imported into this country free. Metal is a wrought article manufactured. The very moment the miners go to work, that moment there is labor used and applied to the article, whatever it may be.

They go upon the principle these metals when unwrought are raw material. Iron ore may be a raw material when it lies in the bowels of the earth, but when the ore has been taken out and turned into metal it is a manufactured article.

If this clause goes through, other metals may also come in free. If they are not produced in this country, it is well enough to allow them to come in free; but if they are produced here let them pay a tariff equal to the additional labor and the higher wages paid in this country. If you will allow it to be introduced into the country our manufacturers will soon be able to manufacture it; but if it is manufactured here, then our producers should be protected, as I have already stated, by the difference in the higher wages paid here than are paid abroad.

The amendment to the amendment of Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, was rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN'S amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Brick, other than fire-brick.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to strike that out.

I do not see how that got into this bill. I see no reason for it. I have heard no cry along the seashore for free brick, and I know imported brick does not reach very far into the interior. The manufacture of brick has become an important industry, and especially in my own State. Bricks are not raw material. They do not make themselves. Three thousand and odd years ago it was found impossible to make bricks without straw, even.

A MEMBER. Where do you find that?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask the gentleman to peruse the book from which the quotation is taken.

Bricks are made by the expenditure of labor to a larger extent perhaps than is the case in almost any other manufacture. Bricks, as I have already said, do not make themselves; they are made to a limited extent by machinery, but largely by hand.

Bricks do not burn themselves; they require to be burned by the expenditure of labor and by the consumption of coal. This House has just refused to give us free coal with which to burn them. The duty to-day on bricks is only 20 per cent., and the revenue, which will be reduced, last year was only $6,157. If this bill passes in its present shape $6,157 is the total amount of surplus, which will be reduced by putting this American manufactured product on the free-list.

There is nobody that I am aware of who is asking to put brick upon the free-list. Who asks for it? No one. On the contrary thousands of men in my State protest against putting bricks on the free-list. They back their protest by assertions and figures which I would detail here to-day, but as we are now under the five-minute rule it is impossible for me to do so.

I see no reason for putting this on the free-list. Bricks are not raw material; they do not make themselves; they do not burn themselves. They are the brick-makers' finished product.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to call the attention of our friends on the other side of the House to the grave injustice of placing manufactured bricks on the free-list, while at the same time they allow to remain on the dutiable list bituminous coal, which is used in such large amounts in burning them. Along the New England coast and in the Middle States bricks are manufactured to a large extent. In 1880, according to the census, the value of bricks and tile, the bricks not being separated, was $33,000,000. And there are over $13,000,000 paid out in wages, a larger proportion perhaps than in any other manufacture. Yet in the face of that fact, in the face of the fact that more than one-third of the cost of bricks is in the coal used to burn them, it is seriously proposed to put this completed product on the free-list. It seems to me if gentlemen will reflect for a moment they will not carry out any such policy.

Mr. MILLS. The $6,000 of revenue which is taken off certainly will not injure the manufacture of this product.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is a duty of 20 per cent. on bricks, which keeps and maintains that industry almost entirely in this country. On the St. John River, adjoining the State of Maine, bricks are manufactured by labor costing 75 cents a day less than labor in the State of Maine. They have coal there, while we are obliged to bring it to our side, and yet you propose to put a duty of 75 cents upon coal.

Mr. MILLS. Your party put it there in 1883, and we only leave it where you put it.

Mr. DINGLEY. But while you put the perfected article on the free-list, you put a duty of 75 cents upon the coal used in producing it. If you proposed to put coal on the free-list there would be more reason for your action. But when you propose to retain a duty of 75 cents per ton upon bituminous coal used in the manufacture of brick, and then put brick themselves upon the free-list, with the labor that is used in this country costing 50 or 60 per cent. more, it seems to me that my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, must pause for a moment and see that so far as this manufacture is concerned upon the seacoast, where the provincial brick may be brought as cheaply from the St. John River to Boston or Portland, or along the coast anywhere, as cheaply as any other brick, that he will destroy the interest if this provision is allowed to remain.

Now, in the platform adopted by the Democratic party, it has been declared that it did not propose to place a single article produced by the labor of this country in such a condition that it would not protect the difference in the cost of the labor as between the production of the same article here and in foreign countries. And yet here is a proposition to put manufactured brick upon the free-list, where the labor cost of every thousand brick manufactured is at least a dollar more per thousand than it costs in the adjoining British provinces, and in addition to that, and more than that, you propose to leave the very fuel, one of the materials used in its manufacture, on the dutiable list at 75 cents a ton.

I appeal to gentlemen who desire to do justice in this matter if such a condition and such a proposition as that is either just or fair or reasonable. I ask if it is in accordance with the principles that your party have put forth and which you have proclaimed at St. Louis? All that is proposed in this matter is simply that we may concur in striking from the free-list a completed manufacture of this description, when one of the materials by which it is produced is left upon the dutiable list.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I want to state a few facts for the purpose of setting members right as to the manufacture of brick. There is very little manual labor about the manufacture of brick as a rule. I have built machines enough to make brick, and to make them at the rate of thirty thousand a day, each machine, to make me somewhat familiar with the subject. There is, I repeat, but little labor about it. All you have to do is to shovel the clay into the machine and the brick comes out just as nice as you want. In my own State, which is one of the largest brick-producing States in the Union, they are paying very low wages, and are employing little boys to do the heavy work and in carting the brick to the floors where they are piled for burning.

If they will go to work and pay living wages, I am in favor then of voting to keep the tariff on brick. But they will not do that. I will say that our laboring men for three years have been trying to get them to add a few shillings daily to their wages, but they have been entirely unsuccessful, although the brick is to-day sold at an enormously high price. And I repeat, while there is little labor used, and that paid for at a low rate, the work being done by machinery, I hope this amendment will not prevail. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, according to the report of the census for 1880 the production of brick in this country amounted in value to $32,833,587, of which product $13,443,532 was paid in wages, and I think that is a sufficient answer to the suggestion of the gentleman who has just spoken, that these wages are low and that but little labor is employed in the product. I think this will compare most favorably with other industries in this country, and show at once that there is a larger proportion of labor employed than in most any other. While in some sections of the country machine-made brick are largely used, yet this product is largely produced by hand, because better brick are made in that way.

Mr. MILLS. If the gentleman had $30,000,000 worth of bricks made in Nova Scotia, or anywhere else outside of the limits of the United States, he would find the corresponding amount paid for labor was greater in proportion than it is here.

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, no; that is a mistake.

Mr. MILLS. I admit that you do pay a higher rate of wages per day or per week or per year; but you leave out the most essential factor, and always leave it out, in your calculations, and that is that our laboring people turn out from fifty per cent. to a hundred or a hundred and fifty per cent. more by their labor than in other countries.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken in his calculations.

Mr. MILLS. I know I am not.

Mr. DINGLEY. Because there are no such facts existing as he suggests.

But I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. I renew it for a moment.

I have seen bricks made in England. I have seen fair girls and young women, old mothers and young children carrying the wet fire-brick from where it is fashioned to the warm boards on which it is laid near the furnace door in which it is to go on the morrow; and yet with all the cheapness of labor gained by the employment of women and children as brick-makers, the day seems to come when Macaulay's New Zealander may take his stand upon a broken arch of London Bridge and look at the ruins of London's past.

As you cross this bridge you behold one of the most remarkable buildings on the Surrey side, St. Thomas Hospital, a large brick building which was not built of Belgian brick, according to contract, because, as my friend from New York says every now and again in this discussion, the laborers of London had learned the power of united labor; but, sir, St. Thomas Hospital—one of the most beneficent buildings in its object and one of the finest for its purposes in its architecture—is a brick building, the girders and all other iron work of which is Belgian and not English, because Belgium can produce her ore and convert it into iron and send it to England cheaper than England can make the materials for her own hospital.

Belgium had secured the contracts for all the bricks for St. Thomas Hospital. The Belgian iron was there, but the United Bricklayers of England prohibited the laying of Belgian bricks in that building, and the managers and trustees of St. Thomas Hospital had to buy themselves free from the parties in Belgium with whom they had contracted for the brick for the building, and but for the pluck and nerve of the British Association of Bricklayers and House-builders, St. Thomas Hospital would stand a monument of the increasing weakness of England, and the intensification of the poverty of her laboring people under free trade, which puts brick on the free-list. There it stands, near the bishop's palace, near the greatest pottery works among English-speaking people—Dalton's. But there the public building is a monument of the growing decline of England under free trade.

Mr. MILLS. The remarks of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] about seeing women and children making bricks in England recalls to my memory a speech he made a few years ago, in which he reminded this House that on a former visit to England he had seen women making nails at 37½ cents a day; and that the product of that pauper labor was coming over here to drive our people out of employment.

Mr. KELLEY. Oh, no; I never said that. I was only talking about the condition of England.

Mr. MILLS. I appeal to the record. You were talking about the tariff and the danger from the product of that pauper labor.

I asked a gentleman who was familiar with the manufacture of nails, how many nails that old woman could have made in a day for 37½ cents. He said about 10 pounds would be a fair day's work for her. That would make the labor cost for 1 pound of nail's over 3 cents. I went to the table of the census prepared by Mr. Swank on the iron and steel industry of the United States——

Mr. KELLEY. I must say I think the gentleman is appealing to his imagination as to my stating the price of the nails by the pound. I never computed it.

Mr. MILLS. No; but you said the woman got 37½ cents a day. That is all you said about it.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. You said she was making 37½ cents a day while our good nail-makers were getting five and six dollars a day; and you said the product of such pauper labor would come over here and drive our men out of the market.

Mr. KELLEY. One moment. I would like to say there that I was not comparing them with our people as to power to produce.

Mr. MILLS. I know you were not.

Mr. KELLEY. I was pointing to the fact that that system had reduced mothers, wives, and daughters to the condition in which I saw them.

Mr. MILLS. I am coming to that. I went to the census report to find out whether there was any danger of our workingmen being supplanted by this pauper labor in Europe. I found out from the census that one man working at five or six dollars a day as a nailer would turn out 30 kegs of 100 pounds each by machinery; that while that poor old woman was working over yonder for 37½ cents a day to make 10 pounds of nails, one man here was sitting by and working a machine and making 3,000 pounds of nails; and that the cost of the labor in the United States was from one-fifth to one-sixth of a cent a pound, while the cost of the labor in Europe was over three cents a pound. And yet those nails are to be brought to this country to take the market away from us. Those nails are to drive our nails all out of the country and destroy our industry.

And then the gentleman brings up a pathetic scene of women and children working over yonder making brick to come here and drive our brick out of the country.

Mr. KELLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. MILLS. Now, Mr. Chairman, my friend, who is a practical brickmaker, or who understands that business, pricked the whole bubble here before us when he told us that these bricks were made by machinery. I have just told my friend from Maine that I knew enough, by general reading, of the efficiency of American labor to know that the labor cost of a thousand bricks in Nova Scotia, England, or Belgium was greater than it was anywhere in the United States.

Now, gentlemen will say that we are endangered by the product of iron-workers in Belgium, in Germany, and in Great Britain, and yet they want a great duty on iron to protect the labor in it. Yet I read the other day a most able and exhaustive lecture made by a German engineer, who was sent over to Pittsburgh to investigate the cost of natural gas. He made a thorough investigation into the subject and went back home and delivered a lecture, in which he told all about these things, and then he concludes by saying that he found at Pittsburgh that forty men working in iron could do in one day as much work as it required one hundred men to do in Germany. That means that the labor of the United States is 150 per cent. more efficient than the labor of Germany. Here was a German engineer, a man of ability, talking to his own people and telling them what obstacles stood in the way of their controlling the market. It is not the labor that is in our way. We have got the cheapest labor in the world. I know that our labor gets more wages by the day, more by the month, more by the year; but it is because our laborers do more work than any others in the world; and when you come to compute the labor cost of a unit of product, I do not care whether it is brick or woolen goods or cotton goods or silk goods, our labor gets less for a given product than labor anywhere in the world receives.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally to receive a message from the Senate, and Mr. BLOUNT took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed the joint resolution (H. Res. 178) granting leave of absence to certain persons employed in the service of the United States.

The message further announced that the Senate had concurred in the first amendment of the House to each of the following bills of the Senate, and had non-concurred in the second amendment of the House to the same severally, requested conferences with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. VEST, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. DOLPH managers at said conferences on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 322) to authorize the Southwestern Arkansas and Indian Territory Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Ouachita River, in Arkansas;

A bill (S. 560) to authorize the Columbia River Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River between the State of Oregon and the Territory of Washington, and to establish it as a post-road;

A bill (S. 667) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North;

A bill (S. 1404) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, and to establish it as a post-road;

A bill (S. 1405) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Oquawka, in the State of Illinois, and to establish it as a post-road;

A bill (S. 1882) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River, at or near Clinton, Iowa;

A bill (S. 1883) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Muscatine, Iowa;

A bill (S. 2199) authorizing the Little Rock and Alexandria Railway Company to maintain and construct a bridge across Bayou d'Arbonne, in Louisiana;

A bill (S. 2674) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Nebraska City, Nebr., and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 899) for the relief of Mary M. Briggs.

TARIFF.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted. If there be no objection, the formal amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment. I wish to say a word as to this brick question. But first I wish to make a suggestion about the mistake of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] upon the question of nails. There is no doubt, I take it, of the fact that the nails which the old lady was making, referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], were hammered or wrought nails, while those referred to by the gentleman from Texas were cut nails. They are not deficient in machinery in England to make cut nails, nor are they unable to find Englishmen who can make as many nails per day as an American can; but by ignoring for the moment the difference between cut nails and wrought nails, the gentleman from Texas has run entirely wild of the facts.

Now as to this question of brickmaking, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] alleges that wages are not paid in Milwaukee that are satisfactory to him in the brick-making business, and therefore, in order to punish the brick-makers there for not paying such wages as he thinks they ought to pay, he is ready to admit Canadian brick free. Does that do any good to his constituents who now make their living at this business even at poor wages? Is it probable that he can benefit the workingmen living along the northern border by having Canadians make the brick that build our houses and by having the brick-makers fed upon provisions produced in Canada, or is it better to reserve the benefit of these industries to ourselves?

There are made annually in the United States over 3,822,000,000 common brick, and in the State of New York over 576,000,000 of such brick.

The capital invested in the United States in the brick and tile manufacture (exclusive of sewer and drain tile) is over $27,500,000, the number of employés is over 66,000 (of whom over 59,000 are males above sixteen years of age), and the amount of wages paid them per year is over $13,400,000. In the State of New York the same manufacture employs nearly $4,000,000 of capital, and over 7,000 hands, of whom over 6,700 are males over sixteen years of age. The wages paid them amount to over $1,600,000 per year, and the product amounts to over $4,000,000.

Under the existing law the duty is 20 per cent. ad valorem.

The value of the importation last year (other than fire-brick) amounted to over $31,000, paying a duty of over $6,000. What the importation would have been with the duty removed no man can tell.

The gentlemen who constitute the majority of the committee who framed this bill live so far from the Canadian line that they are in no wise affected by Canadian competition. Therefore they are safe; and they propose to take the tax off cotton-ties and other commodities which do concern their own locality, and make the people along the northern border suffer in order to benefit their own friends, the Canadians.

They propose that Chicago, Detroit, Rochester, Buffalo, and all cities on the northern lakes shall have their workmen injured by letting Canadian brick come in free of duty, and we shall have those great avenues of approach to our large cities, the Erie Canal, the Oswego Canal, the Champlain Canal, kept busy transporting Canadian products, and the whole line of our northern coast dotted with Canadian vessels, manned by Canadian boatmen, carrying these products to our markets, where they will sell them at prices which our producers, with their higher wages and higher rents and higher expenses generally, can not compete. In the southern tier of New York counties a great many brick are made, but the cost of making them is such that the producers can not compete with the Canadians in cheapness.

It is difficult to see why gentlemen who are so quick to protect their own interests by making cotton-ties free and by keeping a protective duty upon rice and sugar are so ready to pour upon Northern cities free bricks. It is perhaps to the credit of the intellects of our friends on the other side that no man has had the "gall" to attempt to defend the proposition. You can go on and get confused in the matter of wrought and cut nails and talk glibly about general principles, but no man of you has yet attempted to make any defense of this proposition. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I must have been singularly unfortunate in my language if I led the excellent chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to suppose I was afraid of our nail industry being destroyed by the women of the villages of Lye, Lye-Waste, and other towns near Birmingham. I used the illustration simply to show how in the destruction of one industry after another the laboring people of England, apparently thrifty, temperate, and hard-working, have suffered. Those people I was able to visit in their humble homes, because I had with me a lady—my daughter. I visited the women nail-makers, the women brick-makers, the women galvanizers of that district of country.

I want to protect the poorest of American laborers against such degradation. To show the humiliation of British industry, I pointed to the fact that the grandest of the benevolent institutions erected in the last fifteen years in London—the St. Thomas Hospital—is an enduring monument of the incapacity of England to provide material for such a building. The brick came from Belgium, the iron mainly from Belgium, and what was not from Belgium was from Germany. The doors and sash, the door-frames and sash-frames—not only the timber, but the finished work—are all from Norway. Within eighteen months I have seen colored boys in Chattanooga turning out by machinery hammered nails at the rate of one hundred, or perhaps five hundred, to every one produced by the poor women of Lye and Lye-Waste, working in their little smoky coops.

I know what machinery can do, and I know that British fuel will run our machines and theirs as rapidly and as effectively as American fuel will run either native or foreign machines. There is where labor comes in. Their machines run as rapidly as ours. They do not cost so much in the beginning; and the boys and girls and women who attend the machinery in the cotton and woolen manufactories get not one-third the wages paid per hour, per day, per yard, or per piece to American laborers in the same line. One of those colored boys in the Bessemer Nail Works at Chattanooga gets more money for his day's work at an American machine than is paid to five of those women working in English establishments by British methods. I am not afraid that the manual laborers of England in any department will interfere with our industries. I hope I have made that statement emphatic enough for the gentleman from Texas to understand.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. What difference does it make whether the brick are manufactured in Belgium or in England, when there is no duty upon the manufacture of brick in Belgium?

Mr. KELLEY. To the capitalist it does not make any difference; to the English brick-maker it is a question of life or death.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. As there is no duty upon brick in Belgium, how does it affect the manufacture of them or make them cheaper?

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman is a little confused, or I am.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is no duty upon the manufacture of brick in Belgium. Belgium is free trade so far as brick-making is concerned.

Mr. KELLEY. My point is this: The St. Thomas Hospital in London is built of Belgian brick, because England imposes no duty against Belgian brick and in favor of the British brick-maker. Those brick are therefore made in Belgium, where the highest wages paid to a woman brick-maker is a franc a day. I saw those women at their work. I spent three summers traveling among the laboring people of Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, and Germany; and I tell you that a woman brick-maker—a virgin girl, a young wife, or an old grandam—gets never more than a franc a day—a little short of 20 American cents.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That is in free-trade Belgium, is it?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Is not the low rate of wages mentioned by the gentleman due to the fact that labor is so plentiful, not because the duty has anything to do with the question whatever?

Mr. KELLEY. There is no duty in Belgium, and you can not induce me to admit that there is. Nor is there any in England. As the English do strive to pay some sort of living wages, contracts were made with Belgian brick-makers to supply the brick for the St. Thomas Hospital, London.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The point I want to make is, that the duty does not make the difference in the wages; that the lower rate of wages in Belgium is because labor is so plentiful there.

Mr. KELLEY. I am not talking about the question whether the duty affects the Belgian wages; there is not another gentleman on the floor who thinks I am.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But you continually assert that the duty does affect the American wages. Why does it not affect the Belgian wages just as well?

Mr. KELLEY. Free trade has reduced the wages in Belgium until it has extinguished the idea of chastity among the wives and daughters of Belgium.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Why has it not reduced the wages to the same extent in England, so as to leave no difference between wages in the two countries?

Mr. KELLEY. By and by it will. That was the very point of my speech. I began by saying that Lord Macaulay's prophecy was coming true, and that when "some traveler from New Zealand shall, in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's," he will find that the road to this desolation has been free trade, by virtue of which England has imported her doors and her sash from Norway and her bricks from Belgium.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I remember reading a year or two ago a statement in a consular report to the effect that all the nails made abroad are made by hand; that the art of making cut nails has never been developed there. Of course that industry may have grown up there to some extent since; but I have no information as to that matter. I do find, however, that we send abroad 11,000,000 pounds of nails and spikes to compete successfully with the production in foreign countries.

Now as to the matter of brick. We send our brick to foreign countries; we send millions of our brick to compete with foreign brick-makers on their own soil.

It has never appeared that any drawback or allowance has been given for coal consumed in making these bricks, and it can not be successfully alleged that we do not sell largely to Canada the bricks that we manufacture.

We sold last year over two millions to Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, passing by the only coal deposits we know to exist in Canada, and we compete successfully with that country best situated to compete with us.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has brought out, in connection with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH], one or two interesting points. In this country we work largely by machinery. We use machinery more freely than any other people in the world because we are beyond question the most ingenious people on earth. We employ labor for the lighter work about brick-yards; but the heavier work, that which requires greater muscular force, the gentleman [Mr. KELLEY] tells us is in England done by old women and children.

Why, we could employ old women and children here to do the same sort of work, but why do we not do it? Because we find it cheaper and more profitable in those divisions of the work to employ vigorous men to whom we pay higher wages. We know we could employ women and children who would get no more wages than are paid for the labor of women and children employed in England, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But we refuse to employ them at such wages because we find it cheaper and better to employ more vigorous people in those portions of the work. Therefore when he tells about the wages of labor it is only just to tell us in addition that the women and children who are employed in England could be employed here at daily and weekly wages at no more than they receive in England; that we could employ the same class of labor in this country, but we refuse to do it as it is unprofitable. This shows that his comparison of daily and weekly wages is not a comparison of like unto like.

Look at the question in another light. I have the facts here which take it out of the range theory and speculation. From 1846 to 1861 there was no duty on brick, as is shown by the Government print which I hold in my hand. They were free.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to this point, that there was a duty on coal at the same time. The duty on coal was 30 per cent. and 24 per cent. from 1846 down to 1861. I would like to have gentlemen when they speak of these countries to tell us what amount of brick were imported into this country from 1846 to 1861. We were less masterful of the situation at that period than we are now. We then had free bricks, and in addition we had a tax upon coal. We imported no bricks, but, on the contrary, after paying the coal tax, we supplied the markets of other countries. What protection do you need in the markets on our border from countries burdened by over 3,000 miles of transportation? The freight is some four or five dollars a thousand, which is more than the wage. The only effect of the duty, therefore, is to lay an embargo upon consumption, to lower wages, to load down the builder, and to glut the Treasury.

Mr. REED. I was glad to listen to another exposition from the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the great doctrine of labor-cost. According to him there is something in this climate which produces magical results and great wages. According to his idea the amount a man receives for wages here depends upon the amount of the product. If a citizen of India gets 10 cents for a day's labor, and a citizen of the United States gets $3 for his labor, the citizen of the United States produces just thirty times as much. It is the same with regard to England or Belgium, although the relative percentage is different.

If that be so I do not understand why this bill stops just where it does. If it be true that the labor cost in this country is cheaper than in any other country in the world, why is the great truth limited in its application in this bill to the articles to which it is limited? Is it that there is a division resulting from climatic influences inside the United States, as well as a difference between the United States and abroad? This bill certainly indicates such a thing. The labor of the citizen of the United States ought to be equal to the labor of the citizen of India, compared relatively price with price; and yet the tariff tax on rice has been very slightly diminished.

Again, the labor of the citizen of the United States ought to be equal, price for price, according to this great theory propounded here, to that of the citizen of Cuba; and yet only 20 per cent. comes off sugar, while the whole percentage comes off lumber. Is it not singular that this great principle of labor cost, somehow or other, seems to be strictly geographical; that it strikes the Canadian line with cyclonic force, and that the Southern States seem to be so far removed from the storm center as not to be in the slightest degree even ruffled? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, it shows clearly that there are climates within climates. That not only are the citizens of the United States more productive in their capacity than the citizens of foreign countries, but that those of us near the Canadian border are much more productive than those who are a little more distant from it.

This is a variation from the great principle of labor-cost which has so delighted the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and so largely mystified the House. [Laughter on the Republican side.] If in its original enunciation it was true, namely, that the difference which has been suggested exists between this country and foreign countries, why then the tariff bill ought to run straight through the whole line, and without variation. The same reasons are as applicable at one end as at the other. But under the new arrangement, as developed by the pending tariff, it is evident that the whole affair is geographical, and I think, Mr. Chairman, if it be closely watched in the amendments which will be placed upon it from time to time, it will be found that the geographical condition is modified to a considerable extent by the political complexion of the various Congressional districts. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will assume the pro forma amendment to be withdrawn.

Mr. MILLS. I renew it.

Mr. Chairman, we have had various speeches laying down the doctrines on the tariff as they are held by gentlemen on the other side. It has been boldly denied, however, by the gentleman who has just spoken that the efficiency of labor has anything to do with its payment; that the bootblack will get just as much and does get just as much as the book-keeper does; that Depew gets just as much for his labor as the lawyer who has just received his license; that the tariff regulates the wages of Depew, one of the greatest lawyers of the United States, who said the other day in an address to the people that his earnings were equal to an income of $2,000,000; and yet that the tariff regulates the wages of Mr. Depew and every other lawyer of the country as it regulates the wages of the bootblack and the book-keeper.

I said before during the course of this discussion, and I repeat, that the history of this country and its business affairs shows that men are paid in proportion to the amount of work they do; not always the same, it is true, in every part of the country, but in proportion to the efficiency of the labor performed.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has carried this thing out to the extreme, and I hope that I understood him to-day, as it seems I failed to do a few years ago, when he said that the result of free trade in Belgium was to produce prostitution amongst the women of that country. I want to know if that is one of the legitimate consequences of the doctrine of free trade? If it is why is it? And will the gentleman explain why it has not produced the same results in America? Our fathers made free trade here. The free-trade idea among the States prevailed, and was one of the cardinal principles in the formation of the Government of the United States and in its Constitution, which removed all obstructions or restrictions upon the trade of the United States and the commercial relations between the States, and I ask the gentleman if he will say that that pernicious effect which he claims was produced upon the women in Belgium has been produced in this country under our Constitution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And Belgium much smaller in area than one of our own States.

Mr. MILLS. But this is the legitimate doctrine of the gentlemen on the other side and of the Republican party which they represent. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has again called attention to the inconsistencies of this bill, and tells us how gently we touched rice because it is a Southern product; that we would have touched it more severely if it had been located further North. I will remind the gentleman from Maine and the gentlemen on the other side who have repeated that remark heretofore, that we have cut rice more than we have iron and steel. The reduction on rice is greater than the reduction on iron and steel. A large part of the whole metal schedule we left untouched.

The same is true of sugar. The Southern products have been touched more severely than many of the others in this bill.

Why, sir, in the woolen manufactures, where you have a duty under existing law of only 35 per cent. to represent the protection of the manufactured product, we give you 40. We have increased it. And yet the product is nearly all manufactured north of Mason and Dixon's line, or the greater part of it. We have taken the duty from wool, although a great part of it comes from the South. We have done it because it was a raw material, and because it was a heavier mode of taxation to tax the raw material and in addition to tax the finished product, than it was to keep the raw material free and put the tax alone upon the finished product. Mr. Chairman, it will not do for these gentlemen to tell us what we have done in the South and what we have done in the North. Nobody believes this bill is perfect. We do not profess it is perfect. But it is an honest effort to comply with the recommendation of the President of the United States to reduce taxation, which is filling the coffers of this Government with more than $80,000,000 surplus every year.

We have yet to reach the first item in this bill, except rice, where the gentlemen on the other side have consented that one solitary dollar of reduction should be made. In the committee and in the House every amendment that they have offered has been either to restore the taxation to existing rates or to increase it. They mustered their whole force on an amendment to increase the duty on tin-plate that will increase the revenue and the taxation of the people over $7,000,000 in addition to the present rate. They have pending in this House now before the Committee on Ways and Means a proposition to increase the duty on wool and on woolen goods that will add $15,000,000 more to the taxes on these articles, and that at a time when the Treasury is overflowing; when money is taken out of circulation and the channels of business and locked up; when prices are falling; when mortgages are maturing, and when the whole business of the country is in peril of panic. They are proposing to add to that panic by increasing the taxation on two articles of over $20,000,000. We are engaged in an honest effort to try to reduce taxation. Our effort may not be philosophical; it may not be just exactly fair on everything. If the gentlemen on the other side had come to us to help us, instead of to criticise every effort and throw every obstruction they could in our way, they might have assisted us in many cases to make a much better bill. We would cheerfully accept their efforts now, instead of their criticisms, if they would only come and help us to improve this bill and to reduce the taxation unnecessarily imposed upon the people.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I did not know that we were discussing the iron schedule or the steel schedule. I supposed the proposition was to place brick upon the free-list. My colleague [Mr. SMITH] has told this House what he knows of brick-making in the city of Milwaukee. He stands here upon this floor as the professed champion of labor, representing their interests; and yet he seems to congratulate himself that he has reached that period where he has made a machine to take the place of hand-labor in the city of Milwaukee, and that there are very few laboring men now employed there in brick-making. Sir, I want to say that outside of the city of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, there are twenty thousand laborers to-day making brick for a living. It may be true that in my colleague's district, in Milwaukee, there are a few wealthy men with machines he has made for them, which have driven labor from that city into the interior. It may be true those wealthy men are able to carry on brick-making and might possibly compete with imported brick if this bill should pass; but it would be utterly impossible for the men who make brick by hand in the interior, men without capital, to make brick to send forward to build up our cities.

Mr. Chairman, if my colleague has deserted the cause of labor in my State I want to appear here, temporarily at least, to champion their cause; and I want to say to this House that if you place brick upon the free-list you will render it almost impossible for the laboring man of this country with small means to make brick for the market. It can only be done by wealthy men, perhaps with my colleague's machine to aid them in the manufacture. My colleague forgets that for the time being he is simply speaking in the interest of the machine, which has driven out and absorbed the labor. He seems to feel proud of the occasion. My friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS] indorses the evidence which my colleague gave as the key to the situation. But while you progress with this bill section by section and paragraph by paragraph, do not forget that in every step you take in that direction you are crushing out the laboring classes of the country. It can not be otherwise.

You may reduce the tariff, increase the imports into this country, turn the balance of trade against us, and we shall not be long troubled with a surplus in the Treasury or in business circles or anywhere else. Do not forget that prior to the great financial crisis of 1873 the balance of trade had been against us for ten years. We had sent $103,000,000 on an average every year from this country to liquidate the balances due to foreign countries. Shall we see that repeated? Reduce the duties on imports, and you will increase the importations, and not one year will roll around before the balance of trade will be against us, and nothing but the gold of this country will serve to liquidate it; and that drain will continue year after year until we find ourselves again in a financial crisis.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted. If there be no objection, the Chair will regard the formal amendment of the gentleman from Texas as withdrawn.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up much of the time of the House in this debate, and I do not propose to, but I wish to say a very few words upon this question of the effect of law upon wages.

No better illustration can be found of the fallacy of the idea that wages depend upon the existence or non-existence of tariff laws than the cases of Belgium and England, alluded to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] when last upon his feet. Belgium has free trade; England has free trade. They are both upon precisely the same footing so far as regards the law, and yet the Belgians, according to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, make brick and transport them all the way to London and there sell them in competition with English brick. They do this, he says, because the wages of labor are lower in Belgium than in England. Now it is perfectly certain that the difference in wages between Belgium and England does not arise from any difference in laws, for both countries are on free trade. So, on the other hand, when you come to America. Here we all live under precisely the same tariff laws. And yet we find differences in wages in the different States, East, West, North, and South. If it was free trade that made low wages you would find the same low wages in England and Belgium; if it was protection that made high wages you would find the same high wages ruling in every State in America.

Contrast other countries in Europe one with another, and you find there that the wages are higher there in free-trade England than anywhere else. Why? Is it solely because of free trade? No. England has coal; she is surrounded by water, giving the benefits of cheap transportation, and, in addition to these natural advantages, she has free trade, which gives her free wool and free cotton; and being thus allowed by the wisdom of her lawmakers to utilize her natural advantages, she can and does pay higher wages than are paid anywhere else in Europe.

I traveled there last summer myself, and was very much struck with the differences between things in England and in Belgium, France, and Germany. The highest wages paid anywhere in Europe are, as I have said, paid in England, and the next highest perhaps in France, where protection prevails, but not to so great an extent as in Austria and Germany. Nowhere in Europe are wages lower than in Germany. If a high tariff could make high wages we should find wages higher in Germany than in England; workingmen would remain in Germany and not go to England; and yet, sir, I was particularly struck with the almost universal complaint that cheap labor coming over from protected Germany was ruinous to labor in free-trade England.

You find the English newspapers filled with the complaint that the Germans are flocking to England and working for less wages than English workingmen receive as firemen on railroads, brakemen, conductors, barbers, waiters, and every imaginable position a hungry man can fill. I think the gentleman will not deny that that is a common complaint among the English working people, that they are being ruined by the lower-priced labor of Germany. Therefore, sir, it is clear that it is not, and can not be, in the power of the law to secure men high wages. Wages depend upon other conditions; where population does not crowd the means of subsistence; where there is work to do and money to pay for it and demand for its products, wages will be high, and they will continue to be high, and labor will find plentiful employment where lawmakers are wise enough to add to their natural advantages by giving them free raw materials upon which to employ their skill, just as the Mills bill proposes to do for the workingmen of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] says that his bill may not be philosophical. I think it is not open to that objection. [Laughter.] It is a bill which can not be reconciled with any principle which he has enunciated in any paragraph of his speech in the general debate, or of his speeches since the five-minute debate began. If his doctrine of labor-cost be true, there can be no excuse for keeping the tariff either upon the articles from which he takes the duty, or upon other articles of his own region upon which he leaves the duty. It is this discrepancy to which I have repeatedly called his attention. I also called attention the other day to the fact that the chairman of this Committee of the Whole [Mr. SPRINGER] came down from his place and enunciated the doctrine which, if it leads to anything, leads to the abolition of the tariff. I called the attention of his own side of the House to the gravity of the occasion and the distinctness of the enunciation, and not one of them has made any reply from that day to this.

I challenge the production of any speech upon the other side, which, if carried to its logical conclusion, is not in favor of the abolition of the tariff. There is never an argument in favor of putting anything on the free-list which is not an argument for putting everything upon it. The declaration in each case is that the duty is, in the first place, a tax on the people, going into the Treasury to the extent of the goods imported; and, secondly, a much wider and larger tax upon the domestic production, going into the pockets of the manufacturers. Yet I venture the prediction that the Presidential campaign now opening will not be two months old before every one of these gentlemen will be endeavoring to explain his position consistently with protection in certain geographical localities.

The gentleman from Texas has said that there is less reduction on steel than there is on rice. Why, sir, he knows that his section of the country is just beginning an industry which will lead to the production of steel in immense quantities. He knows also that it has been declared by one of the Representatives of that region on this floor that they have kept on enough for themselves and enough to enable the rest of us to starve.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Who said that?

Mr. REED. That is precisely the charge that I made against them. I say this bill, when analyzed, will be shown to be regulated by isothermal lines which take in political districts.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman give us the name of the Representative he just referred to?

Mr. REED. It was a gentleman over there whose name I do not know.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I would be glad to get his name and his exact language.

Mr. REED. There was licorice, which, having been placed on the free-list, was the other day taken off. Why? Because a Democratic district was affected by it. Something is going to be done with wood-screws. A Democratic district is affected by that. Something will be done with carpets. A Democratic district is affected by that. Then there is glue. The isothermal line touched a district there, and glue is taken off the free-list. It is useless for me to try to enumerate all these things. I only point out some instances to direct attention to the nature and character of this transaction.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it will be found that this bill, so far from being philosophical, is political from one end to the other. Yet gentlemen get up here and talk about going on with this measure on account of the business interests of the country. Why, even the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], the hero of the St. Louis convention—the man who managed the Pennsylvania convention in order to find out how, and then showed us in the St. Louis convention the perfect work of a skilled master—came back here frightened at the effect which even the agitation of this question has produced in this country. He stated that even the discussion of it is jeopardizing the business interests of the country; and so it is. Yet gentlemen on the other side still persist in pressing this measure, notwithstanding the declaration of their head man; they are determined to rush on without any reference to the business interests of the country.

The gentleman from Texas complains that we do not help him improve his bill. Why, we have been trying to do that ever since the discussion began; but we have never received from him the least assistance in the world. [Laughter.]

Why, if he would allow us to improve that bill we would make it a fit, reasonable, and suitable bill. We would get rid of the surplus. We would relieve the country from jeopardy of its industries so great that gentlemen from every district could see it even when beaten on the broad field of conflict. [Laughter and applause.]

I want to say another thing. Why was it we were not allowed to improve the bill a little more when in Committee of the Whole? Why were the manufacturers shut out? Why were members upon this floor prevented from improving the bill? Why did the gentleman not ask us for assistance a little earlier; and why was he not a little more disposed to agree when it was proffered to him? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MILLS. We are told here is an argument carried out to its legitimate results would be an argument in favor of absolute free trade. Now, Mr. Chairman, the arguments we make and the propositions we make in this bill, it is true, come down. We propose to reduce, and as we are coming down from high taxes, we are necessarily gravitating towards a point where there is no taxation; and if we should continue to come down we would certainly get at absolute free trade in the end. But there has never been a political party in this country from the foundation of the Government that has ever proposed absolute free trade.

We propose to support this Government by taxation, and by taxation on articles imported into the United States. But we say that when we find the rate of taxation is bringing more money to the coffers of the Government than is needed for an honest, efficient, and economical administration of the Government, our duty to the people is to stop taxation at that point.

A MEMBER. And reduce it.

Mr. MILLS. And reduce it to the point where the revenue is necessary. We do not propose to relieve the people from taxation on imports, but we propose to tax them only to obtain whatever revenue is necessary for an honest administration of the Government, and not to have it burdensome upon them in any way.

Let us see where their argument in favor of protection comes to. Suppose the Republican party should carry out to its legitimate consequences the doctrines which they have proclaimed—that is, to restrict commerce and trade within certain lines with a view to foster the growth of wealth, the growth of manufactures, the growth of agriculture, the growth of all departments of labor. If it is true when you place such a Chinese wall of restriction around the whole of the United States, it is equally true in reference to a single State. The policy would be as good for the State of Virginia, then, as it would be for the whole thirty-eight States and the Territories. It would increase her manufactures, and it would foster the growth of all her infant industries.

Of course it is the legitimate reasoning, if good for Virginia, why is it not good for one county of Virginia? Suppose they should build a Chinese wall around each county of the State, would it not, according to the theory of the gentleman, necessarily foster the manufactures and increase the wealth of the people of that county? Would it not make them more happ and prosperous in every respect? Unquestionably. And if it be good for a county, why not for an individual? That is the legitimate result; but we know that such a thing is a perfect absurdity, and it exposes the fallacy of the whole doctrine.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MILLS. If nobody else wishes to be heard on this matter I hope we will have a vote.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to say a word as to how free trade in England and Belgium has produced the most unhappy social condition. It seems to have startled some gentlemen to hear that in countries probably unknown to them there were families, including parents, sons, and daughters, old enough to be at work, sons-in-law and daughters-in-law who are all huddled together in one sleeping room in such a way as to render modesty and delicacy impossible, and which leads necessarily to vicious social results. And yet that is the condition in Belgium.

They seem to think it doubtful whether they have doomed maidenhood, wifehood, or motherhood to the unnatural task of working in the mines or in the fields of unskilled labor in the furnaces, the forges, the rolling-mills, the glass-works, and in carrying the stone and the mortar and the brick for the masons clear to the upper story of a six-story building, as I saw done in Belgium, in France, and in Germany.

When leaving Brussels with two members of John Cockrell's company I said to them, were I in your imperial legislature as I am in the Congress of the United States, I would try to procure the enactment of a law to prohibit the working of women in these unwomanly industries, imperfectly clad as they are, not only for humanity's sake but for decency's sake, as I saw them working at Charlevoi and elsewhere. "Why," said one of them, "you would ruin us; we can not get men to work at the hard work these women have to do at a franc a day"—a franc, less than 20 cents, 19 cents and a fraction—"we can not get the men to do the work for a franc a day, for they would rather go into our army, and if its ranks are full go over into France and enlist there."

Mr. Chairman, do you wonder that chastity ceases to be a law among the working women of a country thus managed in order to effect cheapness, and to enable its productions, thus created, to undersell the well-paid and the well-housed laboring people of the United States?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on striking out line 132 of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLS. I want to offer an amendment here to come in after this line.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to perfect this line first.

Mr. MILLS. Very well.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have an amendment to offer to the line, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to line 132:
"And other than pressed, ornamental, glazed, or front brick."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] stated that there was but very little labor expended in the production of brick; that they were made almost entirely by machinery. That may be true as to the locality he represents, but in regard to the locality that I have the honor in part to represent it is by no means the case.

My amendment is simply to provide that there shall not be placed upon the free-list the more advanced forms of brick. The Committee of the Whole have refused to keep the common brick off the free-list, and I ask that the paragraph be so amended as to keep off the free-list at least the more advanced and more costly forms of brick, to wit, pressed, glazed, ornamental, and front. The manufacture of these is carried on very largely in my section of the country, and it is done almost entirely by hand. These brick are sent to almost all parts of the country. Some of them adorn the beautiful fronts in the western part of this city to-day. They are to be found in Buffalo, in Chicago, in Cincinnati, and, in fact, all over the country. We fear that this industry coming to be so important may be interfered with by the brick that are imported. Very few common brick are imported, but it is the more advanced forms that we fear may be sold in this country from abroad if they are placed on the free-list, and the 20 per cent. restriction removed.

Mr. MILLS. From what country are they imported?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We fear them from Europe and especially from Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me detain the committee for just a few moments. After almost two hours of solid debate during which we have been listening to general observations on all subjects disconnected with this paragraph, I want a few moments' time in which to tell the members of the committee something about this product and how these brick are made. Bricks are not made by shoveling loose dirt or untempered mud into one end of a machine and taking smooth-pressed, hard-burnt brick out at the other as some seem to suppose.

First the soil must be stripped, and the only machines that can be used for that purpose are the shovel and the cart. The soil has then to be dug up, and the only machines used in the digging are the shovel and the pick. The clay is allowed to be exposed to the influences of the frosts and the air for months. It is then shoveled into a cart and taken to the mixing machine. The mixing machine is simply a wheel traveling in a varying orbit in a wide circular trough by which the clay mixed with water is tempered. It is shoveled out and taken to the man who makes the brick, and he makes them by molding one at a time in a mold especially shaped for the purpose.

The bricks are then laid one by one upon a beaten earthen floor by hand, and when they become sufficiently seasoned they are gathered up by hand, placed upon a carrier, placed in sheds to further dry, and afterward, one by one, by hand labor put in the kilns and then burned. When they are taken out of the kilns they are handled in the same way, one by one. From the very first time the shovel enters the earth until the brick are placed in cars for transshipment it is, I may say, entirely a series of operations conducted by hand labor. I ask that this product thus manufactured by this expenditure of labor be not placed upon the free-list. From first to last the clay is handled from eight to twelve separate times, and this labor should receive protection.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Chairman, I visited a brick-yard last spring where they have the most approved method for manufacturing bricks that is known, so I was informed. I had some curiosity to know the proportion of hand-labor used there. I was told that before the bricks were ready for shipment they were handled eight times by hand.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is the general practice.

The CHAIRMAN put the question on Mr. BUCHANAN's amendment, and was in doubt as to the result.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I call for a division.

While the committee was dividing the following took place:

Mr. BUCHANAN (to gentlemen on the other side). You had better vote for the amendment. You will be asking for our votes in November.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. And we will get them, too.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; unless the voters know where their bread and butter lies.

The committee having divided, there were—ayes 43, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 132 add the following:
"German silver looking-glass plates made of blown glass and silvered."

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the provisions of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. This is simply a collection of articles placed on the free-list. The amendment may be put in at any part of the list.

Mr. KERR. I would like to know why the provision comes in here, or why it ought to be made at all? While I have the floor I wish to say a few words about the position of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] in regard to labor. I have had something to do with employing labor in the West. We do not understand that a German is worth a great deal less than an American for ordinary work. We hire our Germans——

Mr. MILLS. Nobody has ever said that. When a German comes to this country he works with American machinery.

Mr. KERR. That explains the whole matter. The gentleman has been trying to impress upon the House and the country that American labor earns so much more than foreign labor that we can afford to do away with our tariff.

Now he says that American machines with American hands, a high quality of inventive genius combined with American labor, is more productive than a foreign laborer without any machine. That shows the absurdity of all the argument he has been making to the House. Who denies that proposition? Does not the gentleman know that the prices secured to American labor by the American tariff throughout the whole of the American country have added to the character of the American laborer and made him an inventive man; made him capable of inventing machinery that has secured greater productiveness to manufactures in this country? That is all there is of it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KERR. Very well.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I have here a speech of yours delivered on April 28, 1888. I would like to have you explain if the tariff makes wages higher in this country than in free-trade England why school-teachers in Iowa get less than they do in England? As your speech shows, the average wages of the school-teacher in England and Wales was $9.85, while it was only $9 in Iowa.

Mr. KERR. Nine dollars in Iowa?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Here is your table.

Mr. KERR. If there is any such statement in the table it is a mistake. It is a misprint. I know the wages received in Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that the school-teachers in Iowa are the poorest-paid laborers we have. They ought to get more.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The tariff ought to equalize this matter.

Mr. KERR. That is not a protected industry. [Laughter.] We admit teachers from all over the world; and nine-tenths of our teachers are females, and they teach in our schools for very low wages. They prefer teaching to working as hired help in families; they prefer teaching because it is a more dignified calling.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. So it is in England.

Mr. KERR. It affords better opportunities for advancement in the world than the ordinary avocations of life; and those are the reasons why teachers are not paid better than they are in Iowa. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] understands that.

Mr. WEAVER. You must not undertake to prove that by me. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERR. But, Mr. Chairman, the wages of teachers in Iowa, females included, are not less than $30 a month.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, was the point of order withdrawn?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decided that it was not well taken.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand exactly the nature of this glass; but from the language of the amendment, as I read it——

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman allow me to explain it to him?

Mr. BAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. FORD. The amendment was offered at my solicitation. We have an industry in this country, the furniture industry, whose annual product is very large, about $80,000,000. The furniture manufacturers use large quantities of glass, both what is called the French silvered plate and German silvered plate. The French plate is a thick glass; the German plate is a thin glass, a blown glass, not cast. It is not made in this country, never has been, and probably never will be. Duty to the amount of $400,000 was paid upon this article last year by the furniture manufacturers of the United States, and they believe that as the Government has more revenue than it needs, and as this is not a protective duty, it is only proper that it should be abolished, and that all parties should agree to abolish it. German looking-glass plate, as I remarked before, is not and never has been manufactured in the United States. It is made, silvered, packed in boxes, and the original packages intact come to the furniture manufacturers, by whom the article is used.

Mr. BAYNE. Whether any blown glass is made into looking-glasses in this country I am not prepared to say, but that it can be made into looking-glasses in this country I do say.

Mr. FORD. Oh, certainly.

Mr. BAYNE. What is our cheap glass, not a plate glass, that is made into looking-glasses?

Mr. FORD. The German looking-glass plate is not the ordinary, common, cheap mirror glass that the gentleman sometimes sees in the market. It is a highly polished plate which is almost equal, so far as use is concerned, to the French plate, but not so thick. The common mirror glass is made in the United States, but the German plate is not.

Mr. BAYNE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I object to this proposition, and I hope it will be voted down. If this glass is of the high quality which the gentleman describes, it will come into competition with the French plate and with several great manufacturing establishments in this country, one in Indiana and one in my own district.

Mr. FORD. Does the gentleman suppose that there is an inch of French plate glass made in this country that is silvered for mirrors?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know whether there is or not.

Mr. FORD. I think there is not.

Mr. BAYNE. Very well. Then this will come into competition with a glass which is inferior to French plate, and therefore there is all the greater reason for excluding it. It will certainly come into competition with some kind of glass that we do make and silver for looking-glasses. Now, the discrimination which this proposes strikes me as in keeping with many other provisions in this bill. It is certainly intended to drive out of consumption a product of American manufacture or at least it will have that effect. I think we ought to consider this amendment carefully, and I ask that it go over until to-morrow morning, in order that we may have an opportunity to look into the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD. I object.

Mr. BAYNE. Very well. You can not finish it to-night.

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not care whether we can or not. I am voting for this bill under protest, because it does not take off enough duties.

Mr. FARQUHAR. This amendment is brought to the consideration of the House now for the first time, and I certainly think it ought to lie over for at least one day in order that we may have an opportunity to ascertain its scope and effect.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This was given out from the caucus with the other amendments, and if gentlemen have not seen it before it is their own fault and not the fault of the committee.

Mr. REED. I hope there will be some official publication made of the caucus amendments, so that we may know what we are to expect. I have seen such things floating around through the papers, but I did not know they were authentic. [Laughter.]

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, I have formed the determined purpose of objecting upon every occasion during the consideration of this bill to dilatory motions or anything looking to delay or having that effect. I have refrained from taking more than the limited part in this debate which I have because I felt that the purpose of this opposition was to defeat this bill by this delay. I think so now, and am surprised that gentlemen upon this side do not all agree with me upon this point and act accordingly.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] knows as well as I do that any amendment which may be proposed will not be adopted. We upon this side of the House are not so childish as to suppose that opposition to this proposed clause is sincere. We are not going to allow the enemies of this bill to mutilate it or amend it in any form.

Gentlemen upon the other side must not be surprised if we look upon every proposition made by them with suspicion and as intended merely for delay. This bill does not suit me any more than it does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], or his venerable colleague [Mr. KELLEY], but for exactly the contrary reason. I am not satisfied with it and vote for it with a mental protest because it does not go far enough and does not put enough on the free-list. But I desire to secure some reduction and therefore will secure what I can.

I have listened to this debate (a debate that certainly can accomplish no object but delay, whether so intended or not) until I frankly state I have become impatient at this delay, and here enter my protest against having to listen to such speeches as have occupied most of our time to-day.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has had much to say to-day about the condition of the working classes of Great Britain and Europe. He became eloquent and pathetic as he described the laboring women of those lands. One would almost suppose, in listening to him, that there were no poor women in this country. That there are proportionately as many poorly paid and poorly clad and fed women and children in our cities was clearly established by this side in the general debate; and if that gentleman will go with me to the West I will show him women working in the harvest-fields of Iowa, Minnesota, and other States. They will be working there because they have, with their husbands, to compete with the cheap labor of Europe in marketing their wheat and other products. And although they may have to do this and to live in log cabins or sod shanties, they are the peers in womanhood of their more fortunate sisters who reside in the palatial residences of the rich. These are the people who have made it possible for wealth to accumulate by their being compelled to contribute much to the proprietors of protected industries.

We have just listened to an appeal for the brick-makers and laborers. In regard to this subject of brick I can state that in my district, across the river from where I reside, are establishments which, in my opinion, make more brick than are made in the entire State of New Jersey, and they are not asking to have the tariff retained. You may increase the tariff on brick or you may reduce it and it will not make one dollar of difference with the wages of the laborers in those brick-yards. With this now upon brick there is no class of labor that is paid lower wages than the common laborer employed in brick-yards all over the country. And why? Because the supply exceeds the demand.

But I started out to object to this proposal to continue this discussion and have stated why. If this bill is to pass a change in our proceedings upon it must take place.

Mr. FORD. One word in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The furniture manufacturers of the United States have presented here a memorial, signed, I think, by almost every one engaged in that business throughout the country. That industry represents $80,000,000 of production—more than the entire value of the wool product of the United States. More than fifty thousand workmen are employed in this industry. These people have never come about Congress whining to have others compelled to help them carry on their business.

Mr. DINGLEY. They are protected by a duty of 30 per cent.

Mr. FORD. They do not care for that. That duty is no protection to them; they fear no competition from any quarter.

But, sir, almost every article that enters into the manufacture of furniture is taxed—timber, glass, screws, knobs, etc. Why, sir, within a short time a large furniture-manufacturing concern in the city of Grand Rapids, Mich., where I reside, entered into a contract with William Anderson & Co., of Liverpool and London, to furnish them with a large quantity of furniture monthly, furniture manufactured in "the white," furniture upon which simply the cabinet work is done, having no varnish, no glass, no screws, nothing of that sort. This establishment in Grand Rapids packs that furniture and ships it to England. Those English business men supply the varnish, the glass, etc., needed to finish that furniture, and then they ship it to Mexico, a distance of 5,000 miles, depriving us of trade which we ought to get; for, Mr. Chairman, we exported last year only $2,000,000 worth of furniture. We could supply practically the furniture for the world if this Government would give that industry a fair chance. The men engaged in it have asked that certain things which they use be put on the free-list.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The gentleman has spoken of the very modest request made by these manufacturers. Will he enumerate the articles which they desire to have put on the free-list?

Mr. FORD. I do not know that I can enumerate all of them.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Burlaps, I believe, are one of the articles.

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir; burlaps. Then they ask a reduction of duty on French looking-glass plates; they ask that German looking-glass plates be put on the free-list.

Mr. FARQUHAR. And sponges.

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir; sponges. I think a large concern in Buffalo signed the memorial on this subject. That memorial was sent to me. Why I know not, unless because the city of Grand Rapids, where I reside, is recognized as a very large furniture manufacturing place. I replied that I thought it impolitic, after these tariff duties had continued thirty years, to ask that so much in the way of reduction should be done at once; that if so many amendments were insisted on in their behalf they could not probably secure the granting of their application. But I think there is every reason why German looking-glass plates should be put on the free-list. There is no home industry to be affected by such a measure, because all of this article that we use has been imported. Statistics furnished to me by the furniture association to which I have referred show that there was last year an importation of about $2,100,000 worth of German looking-glass plates, on which duties to the amount of $450,000 were paid. The result is that the furniture industry in the United States is saddled with that large extra expense.

Mr. REED. If every dollar of the tax goes into the Treasury and none into the pockets of the manufacturers why does the gentleman object?

Mr. FORD. Because the Treasury is raising $100,000,000 more than it needs, and I say it is robbery to tax the people for more than is needed by the country.

Mr. REED. Your theory is, it is all right if $1 goes into the Treasury and $5 into the pockets of the manufacturers.

Mr. FORD. I am not discussing that now. I am talking about German looking-glass plate for furniture, but I am opposing this tax which has been collected for years and years.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYNE. I ask in good faith in behalf of my constituents this go over until to-morrow. You will save time by doing so.

Mr. MILLS. Let it be passed over informally with leave to recur to it to-morrow.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Vegetables in their natural state or in salt or brine, not specially enumerated or provided for.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means whether that includes potatoes.

Mr. MILLS. It does not. The committee will have prepared and will submit an amendment which will provide for all such cases.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I move to strike out those lines in order to submit a few remarks. Now, it strikes me it is a fair construction of the language employed that this clause will embrace potatoes. The chairman states it is not the intention of the committee to embrace them.

Mr. MILLS. It does not do it.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Then there should be some change in the language.

Mr. MILLS. We have an amendment which will provide for all such cases.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It seems to me this language is of doubtful effect. Now, in the district I represent, and in Wayne County on the east and Genesee and Niagara on the west, bordering on the Canadian frontier, they produce an immense supply of potatoes, beans, pease, and other vegetables, which are protected now by a duty. In the paragraph following "beans, pease, and split pease" are put upon the free-list. If it shall become the law it would seriously affect the agricultural industries of that whole section of country. In the first place, potatoes are protected now by a duty of 15 per cent.

Mr. MILLS. I move the committee rise.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I still retain the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLOUNT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9051, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House adjourned according to previous order.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. GLASS: Joint resolution (H. Res. 186) referring the claim of Robert Dudley, administrator of Fletcher Lane, and C. S. Farrar, administrator of Gray W. Smith, Lucy E. Dowdy, and W. A. Galloway to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: A bill (H. R. 10634) for the relief of Mary A. Ripley—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DINGLEY: A bill (H. R. 10635) to increase the pension of Joseph O. Dodge—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FITCH: A bill (H. R. 10636) for the relief of Charles B. Meyer—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LAFFOON: A bill (H. R. 10637) granting a pension to James Wilson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LANDES: A bill (H. R. 106 8) for the relief of Henry Roark—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 28, 1888.

Prayer by Rev. FREDERICK D. POWER, of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Elizabeth M. Atwell, of Ontario County, New York, praying to be relieved from her political disabilities; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of citizens of Bates and St. Clair Counties, Missouri, signed by A. C. Page and others, praying that Congress may by law provide amendments to the interstate-commerce law so that it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of that act to carry or transport any commodity for any shipper in a car or vehicle owned, leased, or in any way controlled by such shipper, and that it shall be unlawful for any shipper to make any contract with any carrier to convey the property of such shipper in cars or vehicles owned or controlled by such shipper; and another addition, that in all prosecutions under that section, on complaint of a citizen of the United States, such citizens shall be entitled to have and receive, for his own benefit, all fines that may be imposed and collected for any violations of said act in any and all prosecutions in which he may be such complainant.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Clement A. Cahoon, J. G. Ryder, William M. Ryder, and others, citizens of Harwick, Mass., praying for the passage of Senate bill 283, for the better protection of the Yellowstone National Park; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of the Boston Board of Marine Underwriters and others, of Boston, Mass., praying for the passage of House bill 10183, to construct and establish a light-ship off Great Round Shoal, near Nantucket, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of William Pierce, late of Company F, Seventh Regiment Maine Volunteers, praying that he be relieved from the charge of desertion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Waldo County Grange, of Maine, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Portland, Me., praying that the surplus in the Treasury be used in making arable and cultivating the Government lands, giving many people who are out of employment an opportunity to work thereon; and that such lands be divided into farms of 40 acres each, to be let or sold on easy terms; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

VETOED PENSION BILLS.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following acts, and the veto messages of the President of the United States thereon, reported them with the recommendation that they be passed, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, and submitted a report thereon:

An act (S. 820) granting a pension to David A. Servis;
An act (S. 465) granting a pension to William Sackman, sr.;
An act (S. 549) granting a pension to Hannah R. Langdon;
An act (S. 1237) granting a pension to Anna Mertz;
An act (S. 809) granting a pension to Betsey Mannsfield;
An act (S. 838) granting a pension to Mary Sullivan; and
An act (S. 739) granting a pension to Johanna Loewinger.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota, from the Committee on Pensions, reports the several bills named with a recommendation that they pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding. The bills will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand that the report on these bills from the Committee on Pensions is one of very great importance and treats upon the entire subject-matter of the veto of pension bills. I move that 5,000 additional copies of the report be printed for the use of the Senate, and I ask that the motion be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a report in each case, the Chair understands.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand that it is a combined report as to the seven bills now reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the motion to print 5,000 additional copies of the report of the Committee on Pensions will be referred to the Committee on Printing, and the bills, the numbers and titles of which have been read, will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. DAVIS. The committee report seven bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the report to include seven bills; and the motion was to print 5,000 extra copies of the report.

Mr. DAVIS. The seven bills will be placed on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills, with the report of the committee recommending their passage, notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States, will be placed on the Calendar, if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the matter of which 5,000 copies are proposed to be printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be stated, if there be no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. The report of the Committee on Pensions on Senate bills 820, 465, 549, 1237, 809, 838, and 739, granting pensions, and the messages of the President in disapproval thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These bills were returned to the Senate without the approval of the President of the United States. The committee report that the bills should pass, notwithstanding the objections of the Executive, with a report in writing. Does the Senator from Tennessee desire to have the report read?

Mr. HARRIS. I understand that the committee ask that 5,000 extra or additional copies be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] moved that 5,000 copies of the report be printed, which motion was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HARRIS. Oh, it was referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion has been referred.

Mr. HARRIS. That is right.

Mr. PLATT. Will the report appear in the RECORD without having been read at the desk?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not unless ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PLATT. I wish there may be consent that the report shall appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the report of the committee being printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is it proposed to have the veto messages as well as the report of the committee printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The veto messages have already been printed in the RECORD. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HARRIS. I object to printing the report in the RECORD. Let the Committee on Printing report the matter back, and we shall consider it then.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] moves that the report of the committee be printed in the RECORD. The question will be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it a brief report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not state.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to hear it read, if it is not long.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not concur in the full report of the Committee on Pensions in reference to all the vetoes. As to some of those bills that have been vetoed by the Executive, I have very decided opinions; but before the 5,000 copies of the report are ordered to be printed I think it would be well for some of the members of the Committee on Pensions on this side of the Chamber to have an opportunity to read the full report as to all the bills, so as to see whether they concur in the report made as to each and every one of the seven vetoes reported upon.

As to some of these bills, I repeat that I have very decided opinions, and I shall express those opinions when the bills come up for action. As to others, I am not familiar with the facts, and wish to examine them before 5,000 copies of the report are ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] asks that the report may be read.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the Senator from West Virginia will withdraw his objection to having the report printed in the RECORD. As the veto messages have already been printed in the RECORD, it is proper and fair that the report should be also printed there. That will save the time of having it read now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] objected, not the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER].

Mr. MORRILL. I thought the Senator from West Virginia objected.

Mr. FAULKNER. I did not make any objection to printing the report in the RECORD. My only objection, as I stated, is to the motion to print 5,000 copies of the report before further examination; and the motion should go to the Committee on Printing, as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been so referred.

Mr. FAULKNER. Then I can have an opportunity before the printing of extra copies of the report of the Committee on Pensions is ordered to examine the report and see whether I, as one of the members of that committee, concur in the views of the committee.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand that the motion has been referred to the Committee on Printing, and if there should be a minority report, of course that would be printed with the 5,000 copies as a part of the report.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know whether it is in order exactly now to move that the veto messages of the President on these bills also be published in connection with the report of the Pension Committee on these cases, and to have the motion referred to the Committee on Printing.

It is very evident that the object and purpose is to assail the President for the vetoes he has submitted. It is right and fair and just to the Executive that if that is to be a campaign document it should not be given out without submitting the causes of the vetoes, so that the Executive may have the benefit of his own reasons assigned to accompany the report on the subject, and that the country may understand the reasons pro and con for these measures. I suggest, therefore, that if the Committee on Printing should report favorably to the printing of this document, it should also report favorably to the printing of the Executive veto messages on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent that the veto messages of the President may be printed.

Mr. DAVIS. For the information of the Senator from Delaware I will state that in each instance the message of the President is set out fully in the report which it is proposed to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the statement of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I did not hear it.

Mr. DAVIS. I say to the Senator from Delaware that in each instance the veto message is set out fully in this report.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Very well, if the veto messages accompany the report in these cases.

Mr. DAVIS. It does, in each case.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If that is to be the case, I am perfectly satisfied.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report will proceed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] here, who I believe objected to the printing of the report in the RECORD. I raise a question of order as to whether when a report is made in that way, and when it is first presented to the Senate, upon the request of any Senator the report can be read at full length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such has been the uniform practice of the Senate so far as the Chair is advised.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have not so understood, and I do not believe it is in accordance with the rule. I had hoped the Senator from Tennessee would withdraw his objection, so that no such precedent would be set, because I object to a ruling that any Senator can call for the reading of a report when it is presented and before it has been printed or anything has been done with it. If so, the entire day could be taken up in reading two or three reports that would be presented. If it is the right of a Senator to do that, it would place the entire business of the Senate in the control of one Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri object to the reading of the report?

Mr. HARRIS. I will withdraw the objection to the printing of the report in the RECORD, if it is desired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa then ask that the report be read?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; I do not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed in the RECORD, in the absence of objection.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the messages of the President returning with Executive disapproval bills (S. 820) granting a pension to David A. Servis; (S. 465) granting a pension to William Sackman, sr.; (S. 739) granting a pension to Johanna Loewinger; (S. 549) granting a pension to Hannah R. Langdon; (S. 1237) granting a pension to Anna Mertz and the minor children of Charles A. Mertz; (S. 809) granting a pension to Betsey Mannsfield; and (S. 838) granting a pension to Mary Sullivan, have considered the same, and report:

Since the 8th day of May, 1886, one hundred and thirty-six special acts granting pensions to individuals have been disapproved by the President.

Legislation of this character has been a matter of settled and favored policy for a very long period, commencing before the civil war. These disapprovals were based in a great majority of cases upon the expressed opinion of the President that Congress had erred in its judgment upon mere questions of fact, such as the incurrence of disability in the service; or whether death from a disease or casualty asserted to be the secondary result of some disease incurred in the service, ought to be held upon the testimony to be so referable; or whether the proof before Congress showed the existence of any disability whatever.

The practice of the President respecting bills of this character is indicated by the following extract from his message of May 8, 1886, disapproving an act to increase the pension of Andrew J. Hill: "There have lately been presented to me on the same day for approval nearly two hundred and forty special bills granting and increasing pensions and restoring to the pension-list the names of parties which for cause have been dropped. To aid Executive action they were referred to the Pension Bureau for examination and report." This practice is further disclosed by the following extract from the report of the committee upon the message disapproving Senate bill 2005, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, granting a pension to Mary J. Nottage:

The files of papers in these vetoed cases, which are now in possession of your committee, contain a letter of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, under date of June 14, 1886, stating that he incloses enrolled bills as follows, enumerating 118 House bills and 11 Senate bills, and instructing the Commissioner of Pensions as follows:

"Please cause the same to be critically examined, and report to this Department whether, in your opinion, any objections to their approval are known to exist. In cases where objections exist they should be specifically set forth." (Forty-ninth Congress, first session, Report No. 1424.)

That this method of procedure still continues is apparent from several of the messages now in question. The result is that the decision of Congress upon the facts in reversal of the decisions of the Bureau of Pensions are referred by the President to that bureau for "examination and report;" and for any such "objections to their approval as are known to exist," in which cases such objections are to be "specifically set forth."

It is, of course, impossible for the President to examine the mass of documentary evidence upon which each case depends, and which is invariably examined by the committee; and it follows that when he disagrees with Congress upon the questions of fact in these cases, his judgment must be based, not upon the reports of the committees, in which the facts are always stated with sufficient fullness, but upon the report of some subordinate in the Bureau of Pensions. This bureau, whose action Congress has reversed, is thus enabled to review the action of Congress by the express direction of the President.

These reports of the bureau can not in the nature of things possibly be made by any one person within the time during which the President can hold bills for consideration when they are received by him in such numbers. This explains the numerous inconsistencies of Executive action which are hereafter fully exposed.

This method of consideration is an abridgment by the Executive of the exercise of the right of Congress to waive that strict proof which is properly required in ordinary cases in the Department under the somewhat technical rules that have grown up out of repeated precedents. This results plainly from the practice that Executive disapproval follows in any case where the records of the bureau are deemed by the President not to sustain the action of Congress. This invasion upon the province of Congress goes further: It annuls its undoubted power in the cases which have been subjected to Executive disapproval to determine by the will of its majority that the public money shall be appropriated for a legitimate and constitutional purpose.

It can not be maintained upon any fair construction of the Constitution that the power of Executive disapproval ought to be exercised upon acts of this character for the sole reason that the President differs in opinion from Congress upon a mere question of the weight of testimony, or upon the expediency of a special act which subserves a proper general purpose and which imperils no power of any other department.

If it shall ever become established that such an exercise of the veto power has sufficient warrant as to this class of cases, it must follow that it is proper in all cases. That this has never before been systematically attempted in any class of cases does not remove the cause for alarm. Usurpations move rapidly in republics from small objects to those of the greatest concern. That the power exists in the Executive to disapprove any legislative measure can not be denied. But the duty undeniably also exists that it shall not be used in such a manner or upon any occasion or pretext as to make its exercise operate as an encroachment upon the powers of other departments of the Government.

It is the theory of our Government that the great body of power shall rest in the legislative department as the most immediate representative of the people. To that department the Constitution has confided these powers by description if not by restrictive definition and enumeration. Equally with the executive department it is bound to exercise them in a proper manner and for constitutional purposes. But if from a factious or revolutionary spirit it shall ever fail to do this, and thereby cripple the power to act of the other departments, it will then have violated the spirit of the Constitution, and it will be no defense that the violation was committed by the refusal to exercise a granted power.

The Constitution provides that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." A factious Congress can stop every function of the judicial department by refusing to enact laws making appropriations therefor. In doing so it would as clearly violate the Constitution as would a factious or usurping President who should refuse to approve an act making such appropriations in a case where the two-thirds vote necessary to enact the law over the disapproval could not be obtained.

The right to so use the power of executive disapproval as to change the ordinary method of legislative action by a majority vote, upon proper subjects of legislation, merely because the Executive differs from Congress upon the sufficiency of proof or the expediency of relief, does not, in the opinion of your committee, exist. Such a misconception of the extent of executive power, making it limitless, is fraught with dangers to the independence and to the constitutional powers of Congress, and it clearly implies that a factious or usurping President who proposes to subordinate to his will that department to which the Constitution has confided the principal powers of Government can rightfully do this and prevent the will of the people from taking statutory form, except by a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress.

The present Chief Executive has disapproved one hundred and sixty-two bills. Of these, one hundred and thirty-six are bills granting pensions to individuals. All of his predecessors vetoed but one hundred and thirty-three bills. None of his predecessors disapproved any acts of this character, excepting President Grant, who disapproved but five; and none of these were unsanctioned on account of any difference of opinion upon the facts. The bill to pension Abigail Ryan was disapproved by President Grant because her name was already on the roll; that to pension Ann Montgomery was disapproved merely to enable Congress to correct an ambiguity in the act and thereby to benefit the soldier's children; that to pension R. B. Crawford because he was already enjoying all the pension the general law allowed him; that to pension Lewis Hinely because his true name was Heinlig; that to pension Eliza Jane Blumer because the company to which her husband belonged was misdescribed in the bill. These bills were disapproved by this great soldier and patriot, who knew and felt the obligations of the nation to its defenders, not for the purpose of defeating relief, but to enable relief to be granted by amendments, or because relief had previously been given.

The veto power was odious to the founders of this Government. The first count in the Declaration of Independence against the King of Great Britain is that "he has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good." The persistent vetoes of the royal governor led to his expulsion from South Carolina before hostilities broke out. In Virginia the repeated veto of acts to check the slave trade was one of the most prominent of colonial grievances. So unpopular was this power that it was conferred by only one of the first constitutions of the original States—Massachusetts.

To overcome the popular distrust the advocates of the Federal Constitution urged that the power had not been exercised in England for nearly a century as to acts of Parliament; that it would never be employed by any President except to protect his own constitutional powers, or in rare cases of public emergency where revolutionary legislation should menace the general weal; that it was a power whose utility lay rather in its existence and in the fear that it might possibly be employed than in its use; that such existence was necessary (to use Hamilton's expression) "because of the superior weight and influence of the legislative body"—a foreboding which has not been verified by our history.

A cotemporaneous exposition of this power will be found in an official opinion delivered by Mr. Jefferson to President Washington, Mr. Jefferson then being Secretary of State. It was given upon the bill granting a charter to the Bank of the United States. He remarks, "It must be added, however, that unless the President's mind on a view of everything which is urged for and against the bill is tolerably clear, that it is unauthorized by the Constitution; if pro and con hang so as to balance his judgment, a just respect for the wisdom of the Legislature would naturally decide the balance in favor of their opinion. It is chiefly for cases where they are clearly misled by error, ambition, or interest that the Constitution has placed a check in the negative of the President."

"The primary inducement," says Mr. Madison, "in conferring the veto power upon the President, is to enable him to defend himself. Indeed, even in England, where the King is considered a part of Parliament, and therefore possessing a share of legislative power, the royal negative would only be permitted in cases where encroachments were attempted upon the royal prerogative."

The framers of the Constitution well knew that paper limitations of power never execute themselves. They knew that the checks and balances of the Constitution depend for their efficacy upon the wisdom and the patriotism of the persons to whom their exercise is confided. They knew that maladministration can make them as destructive as correct application can make them preservative.

The same just conceptions have been entertained by the predecessors of the present Chief Magistrate. They have, in the opinion of your committee, been disregarded by him.

The inordinate proportions to which the executive power has grown during the last twenty-five years, through the tendency to centralization; through the production of those great subjects of administration which have come under executive control through its departments; through the political influence of office-holders, and through the discretionary power of the Executive over an enormous financial system, give just cause for apprehension. To admit that these powers, "which have increased, which are increasing, and which ought to be diminished," can be reinforced by a constitutional exercise of the veto power upon the action of Congress upon subjects clearly within its province and its duty, and involving not the least infringement upon any other department, is to admit a power totally subversive of the ends of government and destructive to the Federal Constitution.

The following observations are submitted upon the particular cases now under consideration:

DAVID A. SERVIS.

The testimony shows that while Servis was absent on duty for a short time from the military hospital to which he was detailed as a nurse one of the patients filled a pipe with powder, handed the pipe to claimant on his return to the hospital, and that the consequences detailed in the report ensued.

This act is disapproved on the ground that the injuries were not "such a result of military service as to entitle the applicant to a pension."

This is not a case of a mere joke played by one comrade on another while off duty. Whatever might be the rights of this claimant to a pension were this a malicious or thoughtless act of some well comrade when off duty, this case is different.

Servis was on duty as a nurse in a military hospital. He was in a position of authority over the patients, required to minister to and control them. One of these patients, while Servis was in his place of duty, inflicted upon him a grievous injury. The claimant is clearly within the statute (section 4693) which grants a pension to any enlisted soldier "disabled by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty."

The fact that he was detailed to the hospital for duty explains to any one who was in the military service why no record appears of the casualty. In such cases the hospital attendant was treated there and was generally carried on its reports under his detail as nurse. This was of course quite irregular, but it was the way the business was frequently done.

It is to be regretted that the facts and law of this case did not sufficiently attract the attention of the President.

We append the report and the message, and recommend the passage of the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany bill S. 820):

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 820) granting a pension to David A. Servis have examined the same and report:

The claimant was a private in Company B, Twenty-first Wisconsin Volunteers, and he claims a pension for injury to his eyes by the accidental discharge of a cartridge. The testimony shows that while at Bridgeport, Ala., acting as hospital nurse, one of his comrades filled a large pipe which claimant was in the habit of smoking with powder, placing a thin layer of tobacco on top; that claimant, ignorant of the trick, lighted the pipe, which exploded and blew him half across the tent. There is no record testimony in the case, nor does it appear that any notice was taken of this wanton act of his tent-mate.

The application was rejected on the ground that the injury, to whatsoever extent it exists, was not due to the service. It was incurred in the service. It was due to the willful and reprehensible act of a soldier, for whose conduct the military branch of the Government was responsible. If he had killed this claimant, his wife would have been pensioned. That he escaped death and incurred injury to the most sensitive and valuable organ of his physical structure, does not exempt the Government from the obligation of compensation and relief. Surely the Government is as responsible in this case as is the corporation that by accident destroys life or limb, and upon which the decisions of the United States courts have repeatedly imposed pecuniary penalties.

The committee believe that the claimant should be pensioned to the extent of the existing damage to his eye-sight, and report the bill favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 820, entitled "An act granting a pension to David A. Servis."

The beneficiary named in this bill enlisted August 14, 1862, and was discharged June 8, 1865.

It is alleged that about the month of January, 1863, a comrade, by way of a joke, put powder into a pipe which the beneficiary was accustomed to smoke and covered it with tobacco, so that when he lighted it the powder exploded and injured his eyes. The report of the Senate committee states that it does not appear that "any notice was taken of this wanton act of his tent-mate."

There is no mention of any disability or injury in the record of the soldier's service. He seems to have served nearly two years and a half after the injury. He filed an application for a pension in May, 1885, more than twenty-two years thereafter.

Whatever may be the extent of the injury sustained, in regard to which the evidence is apparently quite meager, I can not see that it was such a result of military service as to entitle the applicant to a pension.

The utmost liberality to those who were in our Army hardly justifies a compensation by way of pension for injuries incurred in sport or pastime, or as the result of a practical joke.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 28, 1888.

WILLIAM SACKMAN, SR.

This case was considered by the committee with the care which the character of the evidence required, and the facts are set forth in the original report with more than the usual fullness.

The case as first made by the claimant was rejected April 11, 1883. Up to that date it was based upon his own affidavits, his hospital record, his certificate of discharge, and the certificate of the examining surgeon. This last certificate states that the disability "is a fracture of three ribs of left side, which are very well healed; the body is in poor condition; applicant complains of stinging pains; his inspiration (35) has a whistling sound; expiration, 31; palpitation of the heart."

The claimant's case was manifestly prejudiced by the imputations set out in his certificate of discharge, self-contradictory as it is. This document is in the handwriting of Asst. Surg. John H. Williams, and its material portions are set out in the report of your committee recommending the passage of the bill.

The case was reconsidered by the Bureau of Pensions, and it was then that the claimant furnished the mass of testimony the substance of which is stated in the original report of your committee.

Your committee, after a most critical re-examination of this voluminous body of proof, remain of the opinion that this veteran has not only cleared his character of the odious imputations placed upon it by the certificate of discharge, but that in doing so he has also established his right to a pension.

We do not believe the derogatory statements contained in the certificate of discharge.

It is incredible that if this man received his injury in September, 1862, and did no duty after that date, he should have been retained in the service until February, 1864. The discharge is self-contradictory. It is, as we have remarked, in the hand-writing of Assistant Surgeon Williams. It states in one place that the disability was caused by falling off his horse while in detached service; while in another place it states that the disease has been produced by sexual indulgence and the excessive use of intoxicating liquors. One of these statements, thus written by the same man at one time, must be false.

The claimant has successfully met the attack upon his moral character by evidence such as the rules of law make plenary for that purpose, by proof of good character and by the testimony of neighbors, comrades, and public officials. He has also overthrown the charge that he was intoxicated when he received the injury, by the testimony of comrades who were with him when it was incurred.

The fact that he said nothing about broken ribs until he applied for a pension is of no moment. He had no occasion until then to say anything on that subject. That the ribs had been fractured is distinctly stated by the examining surgeon, who also states his belief that the disability "did really originate in the service aforesaid, in the line of duty."

The Pension Bureau made use of none of its ample means for investigating the case. It sent no special examiner to re-examine witnesses. It made no inquiry of the company officers. To the above there is one qualification which confirms your committee in the conclusion they have reached after two examinations of the case.

On November 19, 1885, the Commissioner of Pensions wrote to Surg. John H. Williams, the author of the certificate of discharge, the following letter:

"SIR: The claimant in this case alleges that three of his ribs were fractured and his left side injured by being thrown from his horse during an engagement with the enemy near Fredericktown, Mo., in April, 1863. The certificate of disability upon which the claimant was discharged the service is signed by you, and shows him to have been discharged on account of 'hypertrophy, with dilation of left side of heart,' stating further that 'the disease in this case has been produced by sexual indulgence and excessive use of intoxicating liquors.'

"It is requested that you inform this office whether your certificate was based upon a personal knowledge of the claimant's private habits, upon the statement of his captain, or upon statements made to you by others. Your early reply with such information as you may be able to furnish touching the general merits of this case will be fully appreciated.

"Very respectfully,

"JOHN C. BLACK,
"Commissioner."

This letter was returned with the following indorsement:

"ASHEVILLE, N. C., November 21, 1885.

"In reference to within I have to state that I remember the case very distinctly. I made the examination in person and was thoroughly acquainted with the case. I read the statement on which the application for discharge was based to the man, and he consented to have the papers forwarded as they read. The application for pension is fraudulent and should not be allowed. The excessive venery alluded to was in part 'masturbation.'

"Very truly, yours,

"JOHN HEY WILLIAMS, A. M., M. D.,
"Late Assistant Surgeon, Fifth Missouri State Militia Cav."

It is to be observed that the bureau, by reciting in its letter what Mr. Williams had written twenty-one years before, furnished him the means of making a consistent answer—in other words, by a leading question put the expected answer into the mouth of the witness.

The proper and fair question would have been to ask Mr. Williams what was his recollection as to the incurrence of the claimant's injuries and the cause of his discharge. The result expected as the answer to this informing question promptly followed. Mr. Williams cast his answer into the mold of the interrogatory. He did more and worse. He gratuitously added a charge of addiction to a certain habit. Such an answer to such a question is condemned by the rules of evidence even when given under oath. This answer, however, is not sworn to. Considering it in connection with the certificate of discharge which was given to this German boy, your committee believe that both aspersions are unworthy of credit upon the present question as they would be in a court of justice.

We have presented these considerations somewhat fully because the President has been avowedly influenced by discreditable, incredible, and unsanctioned ex parte declarations.

We append the act, the report, and the message, and recommend the passage of the act, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany bill S. 465):

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 465) granting a pension to William Sackman, sr., have carefully examined the same, and report:

The claimant enlisted as a private in Company K, Fifth Regiment Missouri Militia Cavalry, on the 24th of December, 1861, to serve during the war in Missouri, and was discharged on the 29th of February, 1864. His declaration for a pension was filed July 1, 1881, claiming that "at Fredericktown, Mo., about the 10th or 12th of April, 1863, he had three ribs broken by falling from his horse while surrounded by the guerrillas."

The claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau April 9, 1883, upon the ground "that the record evidence shows that the alleged disability was not incurred in the line of duty."

The records of the Adjutant-General's Office show the petitioner present April 10, 1863. Absent sick at hospital until October 31, 1863. Present January and February, 1864. Nature of sickness not stated. No evidence by the record of the injury complained of.

The discharge for disability shows—

"Palpitation of the heart and defective lungs, the disability caused by falling off his horse near Fredericktown, Mo., while intoxicated, on detached service, in the month of September, 1862. Not having done any duty since, a discharge would benefit the Government and himself."

The assistant and acting surgeon certifies the disability to consist of—

"Hypertrophy with dilatation of left side of heart. The disease in this case has been produced by sexual indulgence and excessive use of intoxicating liquors."

The surgeon who attached the certificate to the discharge for disability, in reply to a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, under date of November 21, 1885, says:

"I have to state that I remember the case very distinctly. I made the examination in person and was thoroughly acquainted with the case. I read the statement on which the application for discharge was based to the man, and he consented to have the papers forwarded as they read. The application for pension is fraudulent and should not be allowed. The excessive venery alluded to was in part masturbation."

Upon this evidence the Pension Bureau rejected the claim and declined to reconsider its decision, notwithstanding the affidavits filed by the petitioner, as follows:

"Henry Markwort, on the 27th day of December, 1883, made oath that 'he knew claimant, William Sackman, sr., in the year 1860, and also ever since, and knew him while he was a member of the above-named organization with affiant, and the said claimant was, during all that time, of sober habits and of virtuous disposition, and affiant never saw him in a state of intoxication, * * * and was never, to his knowledge, guilty of sexual indulgence, but that he was a good soldier and bore a good name for morality.'

"Frederick Lauderman, Christian Pape, Deiderich Klingman, Henry Thiessen, and John Haslauer, on the 26th day of September, 1883, made oath 'that they were members of the above-named organization, and that they well knew the claimant herein, William Sackman, sr., prior to his enlistment and during his service in said organization, and ever since he was discharged from the service of the United States, and that said William Sackman was a good soldier and bore a good character always for sobriety and moral habits, and that he was never guilty of the charge of being intoxicated or indulging in the excessive use of intoxicating liquors nor sexual indulgence.'

"Henry Thiessen and William Braus, on the 11th day of June, 1883, made oath 'that they were members of the organization aforesaid, and that they well knew William Sackman, sr., the claimant herein, and that in the organization aforesaid, in the line of duty, being on detached duty at the time, the said Henry Thiessen being a corporal at that time in command of said detatchment, and the said William Braus also a member of said detachment, and that while so detached for the purpose of guarding one of their company to his home, the horse claimant was riding took fright and ran off with him, thereby injuring said claimant so that he could not arise nor get onto his horse without assistance. That the post surgeon furnished a certificate to the said corporal in regard of the inability of said William Sackman, sr., to be carried back to his command.'

"William Wolfeckiller, on the 17th of September, 1883, made oath 'that the said petitioner, while on duty on the march from Pilot Knob to Cape Girardeau, in the year 1862 or 1863, was thrown from his horse and seriously injured; that he was not intoxicated at that time; that he served with the said petitioner in the same company about three years, and that the said petitioner was free from sexual indulgence and the excessive use of intoxicating liquor.'

"William Northropt, on the 17th day of September, 1883, made oath 'that he was first sergeant of Company D, Twelfth Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, and knew petitioner to be a sober man and never saw him intoxicated or indulging in any bad habits. The record showing that the petitioner indulged in the excessive use of intoxicating liquors or sexual indulgence is false.'

"G. H. Cramer, mayor of Cape Girardeau, where the petitioner resides, on the 12th day of February, 1884, made oath as follows: 'I have known said petitioner and have been well acquainted with him ever since about the year 1854, while he was, as he is yet, a citizen of Cape Girardeau. I have never heard or seen anything derogatory to his moral character, and I believe he is considered, generally, as an honorable and virtuous man.'

"On June 28, 1882, Fred B. Schultz, examining surgeon of the Pension Office, examined the petitioner and certified: 'The disability is a fracture of three ribs on the left side.'"

The evidence above quoted fully sustains that of the petitioner, that while in the service and in the line of duty he was thrown from his horse and seriously injured. This appears on the face of the certificate of discharge for disability. The records of the Adjutant-General's Department, as well as the Surgeon-General's, tend to sustain this view of the case. The certificate of the examining surgeon of the Pension Bureau confirms the claim of the petitioner in the declaration for a pension. Does the evidence justify the conclusion reached by the Pension Bureau, that at the time of the injury he was not in the line of duty, or that it occurred while he was intoxicated, or that his disability at present is the result of excessive sexual indulgence or the improper use of stimulants?

The committee is of opinion that the certificate of discharge and the evidence of his comrades conclusively show that the injury happening to him by the falling from his horse, near Fredericktown, Mo., was while in the line of duty, and that at the time he was performing services under the orders of his superior officer.

Was he intoxicated at the time the injury occurred?

The only evidence to sustain that allegation is the statement embodied in the discharge for disability signed by his captain. This is contradicted by the oath of the petitioner, as well as the testimony of two of his comrades, who were present and had personal knowledge of the fact, and the corroborating evidence of a number of comrades, who testify to his sober habits. This view is further strengthened by the affidavit of the mayor of the city in which he lives, who testifies to his moral character.

Was his disability the result of sexual indulgence or the excessive use of liquor?

The testimony upon these questions is full and satisfactory. The numerous affidavits filed overthrow even the suspicion that his disability is the result of either cause assigned; and the certificate of the examining surgeon of the Pension Bureau, that "the disability is the result of the fracture of three ribs on the left side," in the absence of all other evidence, should be conclusive on this point.

In the opinion of the committee the claim of the petitioner for a pension should be sustained. The bill is, therefore, reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 465, entitled "An act granting a pension to William Sackman, sr."

The beneficiary named in this bill served from December 24, 1861, to February 29, 1864, in the Fifth Regiment of the Missouri Militia Cavalry.

He was discharged on the day last named for disability. His certificate of discharge states his disability as follows:

"Palpitation of the heart and defective lungs, the disability caused by falling off his horse near Fredericktown, Mo., while intoxicated, on detached service, in the month of September, 1862. Not having done any duty since, a discharge would benefit the Government and himself."

It appears that a claim for pension was filed in the year 1881, in which the claimant alleged that—

"At Fredericktown, Mo., about the 10th or 12th of April, 1863, he had three ribs broken by falling from his horse while surrounded by guerrillas."

It will be seen that while the certificate of discharge mentions a fall in September, 1862, no allusion is made to any fracture of ribs, while the claimant alleges such an injury occurred in April, 1863.

In 1885 the surgeon who made the medical certificate attached to the discharge, in answer to an inquiry made by the Commissioner of Pensions, says:

"I have to state that I remember the case very distinctly. I made the examination in person, and was thoroughly acquainted with the case. I read the statement on which the application for discharge was based to the man, and he consented to have the papers forwarded as they read. The application for pension is fraudulent and should not be allowed."

I have omitted references made to the habits of the soldier by this medical officer.

Of course much reliance should be placed upon these statements made by an officer whose business it was to know the exact facts, and who made his certificate at a time when such facts were fresh in his mind. There is no intimation that the surgeon who made the statement referred to was inimical to the soldier or influenced by any unjust motive.

The attempt to impeach the record thus made is based upon affidavits made by a number of the soldier's comrades, who testify to his character and habits, and only three of whom speak of an injury to the soldier caused by falling from his horse. Two of these affiants allege that they were with the claimant on detached duty when his horse took fright and ran away with him, injuring him so that he could not rise and get on his horse without assistance. So far as these affidavits are before me no date of this occurrence is given, nothing is said as to the character of the injuries, and no reference is made to the condition of the soldier at the time. The third affiant, who speaks of an injury, says that it occurred while on duty on the march from Pilot Knob to Cape Girardeau, in the year 1862 or 1863, and that it was caused by the soldier's being thrown from his horse. He says further that the soldier was not intoxicated at that time.

No mention is made that I can discover of any fracture of the ribs except in the claimant's application for pension made in 1881, seventeen years after his discharge, and in a report of an examining surgeon made in 1882.

With no denial of the soldier's condition, as stated by the surgeon, on the part of the only parties who claim to have been present at the time of the injury, I can not satisfy myself, in view of the other circumstances surrounding this case, that the allegations contained in the claimant's discharge are discredited.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 30, 1888.

[Fiftieth Congress of the United States of America, at the first session, begun and held at the city of Washington, on Monday, the 5th day of December, 1887.]

An act granting a pension to William Sackman, sr.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Sackman, sr., late a private in Company K, Fifth Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry.

JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN J. INGALLS,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

I certify that this act originated in the Senate.

Attest:

ANSON G. McCOOK,
Secretary,
By CHAS. W. JOHNSON,
Chief Clerk.

JOHANNA LOEWINGER.

Your committee have carefully re-examined this record. The claimant has substantially been estopped by the Department and the President from showing the facts in this case by the undue conclusiveness attributed to the coroner's inquest, and even the verdict of the coroner's jury has been misconstrued. "Crowner's 'quest law" has seldom been given such efficacy. But one witness was summoned before that jury. What the fact in reality was concerning this death was absolutely established by the testimony filed before the Pension Bureau.

Emma Loewinger, daughter of the deceased, testifies: "At the time my father inflicted the wound in his throat I was away at work. My mother sent for me and I reached home about half an hour afterwards. My father was then lying on the floor and his wound had been dressed and there was no evidence at that time of any flow of blood. Shortly after my arrival they placed him on the bed, and he lay there apparently without suffering any pain, and finally passed away quietly without a struggle. He lived from three to three and a half hours after I reached his bedside. * * * My father had been sick for a long time with chronic diarrhea, and at the time he inflicted that wound was in a very weak condition, and so much so that he had to be assisted in and out of bed. * * * I know he suffered a great deal of pain during his sickness."

Dr. Werner deposes as stated in the report of your committee.

Meland Freutz deposes that she lived in adjoining house to claimant. On the day soldier inflicted wound on his throat his wife was out marketing; affiant heard something fall and went into the house and found him lying on the floor; saw the blood and sent immediately for the doctor. The incision across the throat was immediately in front and near the windpipe, just deep enough to expose the windpipe without cutting it. The incision was from 1 to 2 inches in length and was made with a razor. Affiant washed blood from the wound when the doctor was sewing it up. There was not much blood. He lived about four hours after the wound was dressed. * * * He had been confined twenty-four weeks to the house prior to his death with chronic diarrhea, and he became so weakened from the disease that he had to be assisted in and out of bed. At times he appeared to suffer intensely with the disease.

Dr. Werner again deposes that the wound was about 2 inches in length and one-eighth of an inch deep; was cut over the larynx and on both sides from the larynx; only the skin was cut through. No large blood vessels were cut. He only lost about 2 ounces of blood. The loss of blood did not change the symptoms. He died twenty-four hours later, as the result of chronic diarrhea.

Your committee remain clearly of the opinion that the deceased, although he attempted to commit suicide, did not succeed in his attempt. But conceding that the death was self-inflicted it is apparent from the phraseology of the verdict that the deceased "came to his death by suicide by cutting his throat with a razor, caused from long-continued illness," and that the coroner's jury attributed the act to a condition of mental aberration, which was the result of the illness. Such an act thus induced is not suicide in legal contemplation or definition.

We append the act, the report, and the message, and recommend the passage of the act, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany bill S. 739):

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 739, granting a pension to Johanna Loewinger, have examined the evidence in the record, which may be briefly stated as follows:

Charles Loewinger, the husband of the widow now claiming a pension, enlisted June 13, 1861, in Company E, Twenty-eighth Ohio Volunteers. Discharged for disability May 18, 1862. Application for a pension filed January 27, 1865, for chronic diarrhea and ulceration of the bowels. He died July 17, 1876. His widow filed her application to be put upon the pension-roll March 31, 1880; claim rejected July 25, 1885.

The medical reviewer rejects the claim of the widow on the ground "that the soldier committed suicide, as shown by the verdict of the coroner's jury, and his death in this manner is not considered the result of chronic diarrhea, nor chargeable in any way to his military service." If the above finding is sustained by the evidence filed with the widow's application there could be no question that her claim had been properly rejected. On a careful analysis of the testimony the committee can not agree with the finding of the Pension Office, and is satisfied that the evidence clearly supports the opposite conclusion.

The verdict of the coroner's jury finds: "The deceased came to his death from suicide by cutting his throat with a razor, caused by long-continued illness."

This verdict is supported as to the cause of his suicide by an overwhelming amount of testimony.

The "certificate of disability for discharge" finds him "incapable of performing the duties of a soldier because of chronic ulceration of the mucous membrane of the colon, resulting from an attack of camp fever contracted while on Big Sewell Mountain, in October, 1861, marked by excessive exhaustive diarrhea, occasional hemorrhage of the bowels, and such reduction of strength that he is utterly unfit for service."

The evidence of a number of physicians, as well as his neighbors, embracing the period from the date of his discharge to the hour of his death, conclusively proves that his disease, for which he was discharged from the service, continued, without intermission, during that whole period, and that he suffered excessive pain and was totally unfit to perform any labor, and that during the latter years of his life he was confined to his house, and most of the time to his bed. That his condition preyed upon his mind, and at times it was seriously affected. Dr. G. C. Werner, who attended him during the last years of his illness and at the time of his death, testified that—

"The soldier became affected with melancholy and became very debilitated several months before he committed suicide. That affiant never had any doubt but that the chronic diarrhea, from which he was continually suffering, was the immediate cause of his melancholy; that death was not caused by cutting his throat, as affiant sewed up the wound and there were no arteries severed, and that, in affiant's opinion, he could not have lived more than a few days longer, as he was then in a dying condition from chronic diarrhea."

This statement is supported by the affidavits of Neland Frentz, Dr. F. L. Emmert, Annie N. Rohrer, Mary Byer, Frank Geiler, Carl Keneher, and Carl Lirche.

The medical reviewer, July 14, 1885, upon these facts, in referring the cause to the chief of the medical division, said: "As the case now stands we must, in my opinion, accept death as due to diarrhea, and not to the wound of the throat."

This conclusion, which the committee think is fully sustained by the testimony, was reached after the medical reviewer had commented upon the case, May 6, 1885, and the medical referee himself had called for further testimony June 12, 1885.

It is clear from the evidence that the pensioner was the victim of painful, exhausting, and debilitating disease; that no cause other than this disease is pretended to have existed which could have affected the mind of the husband of the petitioner and caused him to take his life. And it is fair to conclude that at the time he made the attempt on his life his mind, by reason of the disease contracted in the service, was seriously affected. And the evidence of the physician that he did not die from the injury inflicted, but as the result of his debilitated condition, resulting from that disease, seems to your committee conclusive of the case.

The conclusion of the committee in this case is fully sustained by the decisions and rulings of the Pension Bureau, found in the "Digest of Pension Laws and Decisions," pages 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 279.

Your committee would report the bill favorably, after amending the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Johanna Loewinger," and by striking out, in line 6, the word "Johnanna" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Johanna."

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 739 entitled "An act granting a pension to Johanna Loewinger."

The husband of the beneficiary named in this bill enlisted June 28, 1861, and was discharged May 8, 1862, upon a surgeon's certificate of disability. He was pensioned for chronic diarrhea. He died July 17, 1876. A coroner's inquest was held, who found by their vedict that the deceased came to his death "from suicide by cutting his throat with a razor, caused by long-continued illness."

This inquest was held immediately after the soldier's death, and it appears that the case was fully investigated with full opportunities to discover the truth. Upon the verdict found, in the absence of insanity caused by any disability, it can hardly be claimed that his death was caused by his military service. The attempts afterwards to impeach this verdict and introduce another cause of death do not seem to be successful.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 5, 1888.

[Fiftieth Congress of the United States of America, at the first session, begun and held at the city of Washington, on Monday, the 5th day of December, 1887.]

An act granting a pension to Johnanna Loewinger.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Johnanna Loewinger, widow of Charles Loewinger, deceased, late of Company E, Twenty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN J. INGALLS,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

I certify that this act originated in the Senate.

ANSON G. McCOOK,
Secretary.

HANNAH R. LANGDON.

Your committee, after re-examining the records in this case, adhere to their former report.

We are clearly of the opinion that the claim should have been allowed by the Department, and this widow should have thus become entitled to receive what is due her from the Government from the date of her application, instead of from the date of the passage of the special act in her behalf.

It seems to have attracted the attention of the President that the deceased husband tendered his resignation in less than six months after entering the military service. This is true. He served from October 7, 1862 to March 27, 1863. But he had been stationed at Pensacola and Santa Rosa Island, Florida, and there contracted the diseases (chronic hepatis and diarrhea) which forced him to quit the service. The change of climate in his case was an extreme one. He was undoubtedly entitled to a pension from the date of his resignation. From motives of pride, doubtless, he did not apply for it until June, 1880, and it was allowed to him in January, 1881, for chronic diarrhea and resulting piles. He died in September, 1881. Some five years before his death he began to break down, evincing symptoms of the disease of which he finally died, and was reduced to a physical condition which invited it and made him an easy victim to its attack.

Dr. H. H. Atwater, a member of the board of examining surgeons, in an affidavit filed December 5, 1881, deposes that he first professionally advised for the deceased five or six years since, for purpura hæmorrhagia, consequent upon an impoverished condition of the blood; also for various derangements of the digestive organs, and continued to advise him for such derangements at occasional intervals during the next three or four years. * * * That he began to treat him regularly about two years since, for pleuro-pneumonia, followed by abscesses and degeneration of lung tissue; and that these diseased conditions were complicated with the above-mentioned digestive affections, such as diarrhea, dyspepsia, indigestion, etc. That, in his opinion, the said Langdon was incapacitated for manual labor about one-eighth of the time, during the first three or four years of his treatment, and totally incapacitated during nearly all of the last two years of his life.

Warren Gibbs, next neighbor to Dr. Langdon, deposes December 30, 1880, that the "deceased has been in a gradually failing condition for years; think he has done little business for the last two years on account of not being in sufficient health."

To this testimony no effect seems to have been given in the Department or in the message.

It is stated in the message that the breaking down, cough, emaciation, and debility were not made by the deceased any ground of a claim for pension. In this respect the President was insufficiently informed as to the facts. On August 30, 1881, less than one month before he died, Dr. Langdon applied for an increase of pension, in which application he deposes as follows:

"The disability for which he (affiant) is pensioned has resulted in loss of appetite, bad cough, and bloody expectoration, increased respiration, hemorrhage of the lungs, loss of flesh (39 pounds) to such an extent that he is not capable of any manual labor whatever. The hemorrhoids have so disabled me that I am at times unable to sit upon a chair. Loss of appetite being almost total."

We append the act, the report, and the message, and recommend the passage of the act, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany bill S. 549):

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 549) granting a pension to Hannah R. Langdon, have examined the same, and report:

A bill to pension this widow was reported favorably by this committee, and passed the Senate during the last Congress. The former report is herewith appended, and your committee again recommend the passage of the bill.

That the petitioner is the widow of Dr. Henry H. Langdon, late an assistant surgeon in the Seventh Regiment Vermont Volunteers, war of the rebellion; that he enlisted in the Army October 7, 1862, and was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability March 27, 1863; that at the time of his death, 24th September, 1881, he was receiving a pension of $8.50 per month for chronic diarrhea and piles, contracted at Pensacola and Santa Rosa Island, Fla., about January, 1863; that the petitioner filed a claim for pension December 5, 1881, which was rejected on the ground that it failed to appear in the papers in the case that the disease from which the officer died (consumption) was in any degree traceable to his military service.

On this point the affidavits of Dr. A. P. Grinnell and Dr. H. H. Atwater, submitted to your committee, among other proofs and papers, would seem to be conclusive, which are as follows:

"I, A. P. Grinnell, of the city of Burlington, Vt., of lawful age, on oath depose and say, that I am a practicing physician in Burlington, Vt., and have been for the last fourteen years; that I was acquainted with Dr. H. H. Langdon and knew him and his family from boyhood, and also saw him quite frequently, and advised with him often regarding the treatment of his disease, although I was not his regular professional attendant; that no history of consumption could be traced in his family; that I am acquainted with Hannah R. Langdon, and know that she is the widow of said Dr. H. H. Langdon, and has not married since his decease; that I have read her petition for a pension, and state that I have no doubt from the facts set forth in said petition and from my personal knowledge of said Dr. Langdon's condition, that his lung trouble was the direct result of his chronic diarrhea, and that the chronic diarrhea was the cause of his death.

"A. P. GRINNEELL, M. D.

"Subscribed and sworn to this 10th day of November, 1886, before me.

"J. M. RUSSELL,
"Justice of the Peace."

"I, Hiram H. Atwater, United States examining surgeon for pensions, do depose and say that, as a member of the board of examining surgeons, I examined Henry H. Langdon, assistant surgeon of the Seventh Vermont Regiment, December 1, 1880, who claimed a pension for chronic diarrhea and piles, and that upon the certificate of said examination said Langdon was granted a pension. I further state that said Langdon died 24th September, 1881; that I saw him and prescribed for him several times during his last sickness; that the immediate cause of his death was disease of the lungs; and that I believe this disease supervened upon and was associated with the chronic diarrhea for which he was pensioned, and that this latter disease was the remote cause of his death. I further state that I have read the petition of Mrs. Langdon, and that I believe reliance can be placed upon her statements.

"H. H. ATWATER.

"Personally appeared before me this 16th day of November, 1886, at Burlington, Vt., Dr. H. H. Atwater, and made oath to the above affidavit by him subscribed.

"J. M. RUSSELL,
"Justice of the Peace."

In view of the statements contained in these affidavits, the signers of which are gentlemen well known to be of the very highest standing in their profession and in the community where they and Dr. Langdon resided, your committee are of the opinion that the prayer of the petitioner should be granted; and therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

To the Senate:

I return herewith without approval Senate bill No. 549, entitled "An act granting a pension to Hannah R. Langdon."

The husband of the beneficiary named in this bill entered the military service of the United States as assistant surgeon in a Vermont regiment on the 7th day of October, 1862, and less than six months thereafter tendered his resignation, based upon a surgeon's certificate of disability on account of chronic hepatitis (inflammation of the liver) and diarrhea.

On the 12th day of June, 1880, more than seventeen years after his discharge, he filed a claim for pension, alleging chronic diarrnea and resulting piles. He was allowed a pension in January, 1881, and died of consumption on the 24th day of September in the same year.

Prior to the allowance of his claim for pension he wrote to the Bureau of Pensions a full history of his disability as resulting from chronic diarrhea and piles, and in that letter he made the following statement: "I have had no other disease, except last September (1880) I had pleurisy and congestion of my left lung." From other sources the bureau derived the information that the deceased had suffered an attack of pleuro-pneumonia on his left side, and that his recovery had been partial.

In December, 1880, he was examined by two members of the board of surgeons at Burlington, Vt., of which board he was also a member, and the following facts were certified:

"For the past fifteen years claimant has practiced his profession in this city, and has, up to within a year or year and a half of this date, shown a vigor and power of endurance quite equal to the labor imposed upon him by the popular demand for his services. About a year ago he evinced symptoms of breaking down, cough, emaciation, and debility."

These results, "breaking down, cough, emaciation, and debility," are the natural effects of such an attack as the deceased himself reported, though not made by him the ground of a claim for pension, and it seems quite clear that his death in September, 1881, must be chargeable to the same cause.

His widow, the beneficiary named in this bill, filed her claim for pension December 5, 1881, based upon the ground that her husband's death from consumption was due to the chronic diarrhea for which he was pensioned. Upon such application the testimony of Dr. H. H. Atwater was filed, to the effect that about 1879 he began to treat the deceased regularly for pleuro-pneumonia, followed by abscesses and degeneration of lung tissue, which finally resulted in death; and that these diseased conditions were complicated with digestive affections, such as diarrhea, dyspepsia, and indigestion. Another affidavit of Dr. Atwater, made in 1886, will be found in the report upon this bill by the House Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The claimant's application for a pension was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the cause of her husband's death was not shown to have been connected in any degree with the disease on account of which he was pensioned, or with his military service.

I am entirely satisfied that this determination was correct.

I am constrained to disapprove the bill under consideration, because it is thus far our settled and avowed policy to grant pensions only to widows whose husbands have died from causes related to military service, and because the proposed legislation would in my opinion result in a discrimination in favor of this claimant unfair and unjust to thousands of poor widows who are equally entitled to our sympathy and benevolence.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Hannah R. ANNA MERTZ.

A critical re-examination of the records in the Pension Bureau and also of the additional evidence and the petition filed with the committee, upon all of which their report was founded, fully justifies the conclusion therein stated.

Upon the face of the record in the Bureau of Pensions there is, in our opinion, evidence amply sufficient to justify such conclusion. To this body of testimony are to be added the proofs and the petition which were laid before the committee, and which, manifestly from the message, the President has never seen. The claimant has thus suffered prejudice from the fact that the revising authority considered only a part of the evidence. If such a method of re-examination by the Chief Executive is to obtain, the result will be that any new testimony and all petitions laid before the committee are struck out of the case upon the appeal upon mere questions of fact, which is entertained for the first time in the history of the Government by the President upon bills of this character. The fruits of the right to petition Congress are thus denied the citizen, and he is judged solely upon the representations which he may have previously made to a bureau of one of the Departments. This is manifestly true unless the President applies to Congress for the additional testimony or petitions upon which it has acted, and your committee feel warranted in stating that no such application has ever been made.

More than this: If it shall become established, in case of private right and legislative relief therefor, that executive disapproval will annul legislative action, unless it expressly appears by documentary evidence that the weight of testimony sustains such action, the hitherto undoubted right of the legislative department to act upon the knowledge of its members, or upon parol representations, or upon considerations of sound policy in individual cases, or upon mere petition, will be annihilated in such instances by an arbitrary and technical rule of procedure adopted by the President. It can not be successfully contended by the most intrepid advocate of the vast extension which the veto power has received from the present Chief Executive that any application of that power which produces practical collision between the legislative and executive departments by abridging the one by the mere will of the other is anything less than encroachment by the latter upon the former.

Such a consequence is conclusive that the power of disapproval by the President was never intended to apply to cases of this character, where the only question is as to the weight of testimony. That Congress may err in its judgment as to testimony does not affect the principle nor at all derange the constitutional limitations upon the several departments of the Government.

The case of the pauper widow and children of this soldier is in itself of no great consequence to any persons excepting themselves. But their case as connected with the rights of others in like situation, and with the rights and duties of the legislative and executive departments as to each other, is of the greatest public concern; and the more so because it is upon the rights of the weak and defenseless that usurpation always first lays its hands and is made strong by precedent for attack upon interests of more general importance.

In addition to the records of the Bureau of Pensions the committee had before them the following:

1. The affidavit of the claimant dated December 17, 1887, stating, among other facts, that "about three years prior to his (the husband's) death he brought home medicine given him by a regular physician; that said Mertz told affiant it contained morphine; that from that time on until his death he continued to take similar medicine, but at no time, so far as affiant knows or believes, without being both prescribed and prepared, or prescribed (and prepared by a regular druggist) by a competent and regularly practicing physician."

2. A petition signed by 53 citizens of Mattoon, Ill., praying a pension to this widow and her children. It is dated December 9, 1886, is addressed to General John A. Logan, and filed with the committee by Senator CULLOM.

This claim was rejected August 8, 1886, and the committee carefully considered the following evidence filed in the Bureau of Pensions afterwards, namely, the affidavit of P. A. Kemper, the family physician of the deceased. It was sworn to February 25, 1887. It states that affiant "from June 1872 to 1883 was his family physician; saw him often and was consulted by him from 1872 to June 1883, at various times for chronic diarrhea and at times a severe pain in the head; this last was so severe at times that he became nearly crazy from it; that I prescribed the usual remedies for his sickness, camphor, opium, bismuth, etc. He always desired morphine for his head troubles from me, saying that was what they gave him in the Army for it, and that it gave him more ease than anything else. I nearly always gave it to him, and often talked with him about taking it, and about the dose, etc.; remember once showing him about the quantity to take for a safe dose."

Other evidence, not deemed necessary to be here set out, was also submitted after the rejection of the claim, but was not deemed by the Pension Bureau sufficient to warrant reopening the case.

We append the act, the report, and the message, and recommend the passage of the act, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report, to accompany bill S. 1237:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1237) granting a pension to Anna Mertz, widow, and the minor children of Charles A. Mertz, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant is the widow of Charles A. Mertz, deceased, who was a captain in Company K, of Sixty-second Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the war of the rebellion. The husband was mustered into the service as captain, April 10, 1862, and resigned June 7, 1863. It appears from certificate of Dr. John W. Cameron, surgeon of the regiment, dated Jackson, Tenn., 6th day of January, 1863, that he was suffering from disease in such manner as to require a furlough of thirty days, and furlough was recommended for that time. He returned, however, to the regiment at Jackson, Tenn., but on the 17th of May, 1863, the surgeon of the regiment again certified that he was wholly unfit for duty, and that there would be no probability of his recovery in less than six months, if at all. Upon this he tendered his resignation and the same was accepted. He returned home but never recovered. It appears from the testimony of his comrades and neighbors on file that he was a sound, healthy man when he entered the Army. It is shown that he was attacked while in the service, from the labor and exposure incident thereto, with chronic intermittent fever, followed by acute dysentery, which debilitated him to the extent that he was wholly unfit for duty.

Upon his return home, as appears from the evidence of his neighbors, and Dr. Keneper and others, he was continuously affected with chronic diarrhea, catarrh, and intense pains in the head. To ease his suffering he frequently took laudanum and morphine under the advice of physicians. This relief was, however, temporary. He never applied for a pension, although he constantly attributed his complaints to his Army service. He worked occasionally at his trade, but was subject at any time to attacks of very severe diarrhea, accompanied with acute catarrhal pains in the head and face. On the 1st of December, 1884, he died from the effects of an overdose of morphine taken to alleviate his suffering. The evidence does not show that he had a prescription from a physicinn upon the occasion of the fatal dose. It shows that he had, under medical advice several times given him, taken the same medicine, and was in the habit of taking it when attacked by his disease. We think the death clearly traceable to the disease as its primary cause.

The widow is very poor; has two children of this soldier, offspring of her marriage with him, depending upon her support.

We recommend passage of the bill, amended by inserting "captain" in seventh line, in place of "private," which is a misdescription of the deceased.

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 1237, entitled "An act granting a pension to Anna Mertz."

The beneficiary named in this bill is the widow of Charles A. Mertz, who served in the Army as a captain from April, 1862, to June, 1863, when he resigned on account of impaired health. It is stated in the committee's report that after his return from the Army he worked occasionally at his trade, though subject to attacks of very severe diarrhea, accompanied with acute catarrhal pains in the head and face, which he constantly attributed to his Army service.

It is alleged that he had several times taken morphine under medical advice to allay pain caused by these attacks.

He did not apply for a pension.

On the 1st day of December, 1884, more than twenty-one years after his discharge from the Army, he died from an overdose of morphine self-administered, for the purpose, it is claimed, of alleviating his suffering.

I do not think that in this case the death of the soldier was so related to his military service as to entitle his widow to a pension.

BETSEY MANNSFIELD.

The papers in this case are voluminous and the testimony is in some particulars contradictory.

The committee remain of the opinion that, upon a fair construction, the preponderance is in favor of the claimant.

To a mind prepossessed with reluctance to allow any claim for a pension unless proved beyond a doubt, and habituated to resolve all doubts against the soldier or his child or widow, material for controversy upon the facts exists in this case.

Your committee do not deem this to be the proper method of considering such cases, and they therefore repeat their recommendation that the bill be passed, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

The report, message, and bill are appended.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report to accompany bill (S. 809):

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 809) granting a pension to Betsey Mannsfield, have examined the same and report:

The claimant is Betsey Mannsfield, mother of Franklin Mannsfield, a private in Company I, Fifth Wisconsin Infantry, who died at Fairfax, Va., November 14, 1861.

From the evidence it appears that the soldier was a mere youth at the time of his enlistment: that he enlisted contrary to the father's wishes; that his death affected his father very seriously, and that he became and remained dissipated and reckless. It is also shown by the evidence that soon after his son's death he was seriously injured by a fall; that his mind was affected, wholly unfitting him for business or manual labor.

The claim is rejected on the ground that he was the owner of considerable land, which was purchased at an early period, but it does not appear that it was productive, or that much of it was improved. Immediately after his son's death he sold a horse belonging to the soldier, and which he had left at home. The price obtained was $50, and the money was used for their support. While felling timber, prior to 1861, he was struck on the head, and in addition to his other peculiarities he became deranged on the subject of religion and persisted in exciting discussions. It is affirmed by reputable witnesses that the net income, in 1861, from his farm and shop did not exceed $150, and some years it was less.

It is in evidence that prior to the son's enlistment the father was subject to temporary mental incapacity; that the claimant has earned her own living by toil and management. In 1883 their possessions were reduced to 40 acres, mortgaged to affiant, O. D. Bishop, for $600, two cows, and a pig. The father, years back, owned more land, but it had been sold from time to time to pay debts incurred in a reckless way, and from which there was no escape. There is no contradictory evidence that is of any value, and it is apparent that the mother is very old, very needy; that she has bravely struggled to maintain herself, and that it is time she had relief.

The bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

To the Senate:

I return herewith without approval Senate bill No. 809, entitled "An act granting a pension to Betsey Mannsfield."

It is proposed to grant a pension to the beneficiary named in this bill as the mother of Franklin J. Mannsfield, who enlisted as a private April 27, 1861, and died in camp of disease on the 14th day of November in the same year. His mother filed an application for pension in June, 1882.

The testimony filed in the Pension Bureau discloses the following facts:

At the time of the death of the soldier the family, beside himself, consisted of three persons—his father and mother and an unmarried sister. They owned and resided upon a homestead in Wisconsin comprising 293 acres, 20 of which were cleared, the balance being in timber, all unincumbered. The assessed valuation was $1,170; the real value being considerably more. The father was a farmer and blacksmith, healthy and able bodied, and furnishing a comfortable support; but shortly after the soldier's death he began to drink and his health began to fail. Upon the marriage of the daughter he deeded her 50 acres of the land. He became indebted, and from time to time sold portions of his homestead to pay debts; but in 1882, at the time the mother's application for pension was filed, there still remained 110 acres of land, valued at about $3,300, 40 acres of which was mortgaged in 1880 for $600. Since 1879 the farm had been rented, except 8 or 10 acres reserved for a residence for the family. They owned two cows, and the rent averaged about $125 a year.

This was the condition of affairs as late as 1886, when the claim of the mother for a pension was, after investigation, rejected by the Pension Bureau, and it is supposed to be substantially the same now.

It also appears that a son, born since the soldier's death, and upwards of eighteen years of age, resides with his parents and furnishes them some assistance.

The claimant certainly was not dependent in the least degree upon the soldier at the time of his death, and she did not file her claim for pension until nearly twenty-one years thereafter.

Though the lack of dependence at the date of the soldier's death is sufficient to defeat a parent's claim for pension under our laws, I believe that in proper cases a relaxation of rules and a charitable liberality should be shown to parents old and in absolute need, through default of the help which, it may be presumed, a son would have furnished if his life had not been sacrificed in his country's service.

But it seems to me the case presented here can not be reached by any theory of pensions which has yet been suggested.

MARY SULLIVAN.

The fact that a special statute exists for this claimant's relief makes the act under consideration merely superfluous.

Bills granting pensions to individuals are presented in great numbers to Congress. Nearly all of these are cases which have been adversely determined by the Bureau of Pensions. The testimony in each of such cases is invariably transmitted by that bureau to the committee, by whom it is carefully investigated. The record is generally voluminous. It presents questions of law and fact which are not infrequently hard to solve. The duty of deciding these is as clearly legislative as the office of President has been said to be "essentially executive."

In undertaking to reconsider hundreds of such investigations, to review the mass of testimony in each case, to detect into what errors of fact, if any, Congress has fallen, the President, even when aided by the "examination and report" or by "the objections to their approval" of the Pension Bureau, has become involved in repeated inconsistencies from which injustice has resulted. He has approved many bills substantially identical with those with which this report is concerned. By such contradictory action many claimants have become pensioners, while many others have been denied relief by his adverse action upon facts of substantial identity.

It has not been difficult to select the following examples of inconsistent Executive action.

A brief statement of these cases and also the reports are appended hereto:

[Catherine Collins, dependent mother. Report No. 336, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Claim rejected on ground that while death occurred in service, it resulted from being run over by cars and was not incurred in line of duty. Became a law without approval. Received by the President April 27, 1886.

[Elise Burki, widow. Report No. 332, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Soldier pensioned for gunshot wound in left leg. Widow's claim rejected on ground that soldier died of cerebral meningitis. Approved May 22, 1886.

[Margaret Smith, widow. Report No. 601, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Soldier pensioned for injuries to veins of right leg, incurred in marches in Mexico. Served two years in rebellion, during which time he was dropped, after which he was restored to and retained on rolls till death, which occurred from "old age and disease of liver." Approved June 22, 1886.

[Maria Hollands, widow. Report No. 603, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Soldier pensioned for wound in wrist. Died of neuralgia of heart. Rejected for want of pathological connection. Became a law without approval. Received by the President April 27, 1886.

[Mary S. Webster, dependent mother. Report No. 725, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Soldier lost arm in 1864; drew pension until enlistment in regular Army in 1867. In 1869, at Madison Barracks, New York, he took an overdose of laudanum, from which he died. Claim of mother rejected on ground of suicide. Became a law without approval. Received by the President April 27, 1886.

[Elizabeth B. Bell, widow. Report No. 757, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Soldier enlisted and served till close of war, when he was honorably discharged. Received three gunshot wounds, one of which "struck the outer corner of the right eye, making an indentation in the skull, glancing around the head and coming out about an inch back of the left ear." He shot himself January 16, 1880, while suffering intense pain. Soldier never pensioned. Approved June 1, 1886.

[Eugenia A. Smalley, widow. Report No. 763, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Soldier received a gunshot wound through left arm above elbow into chest, fracturing two ribs. Died February 21, 1880, by falling from an elevator on which he was working. Widow's claim rejected on ground that death was not attributable to military service. Approved July 3, 1886.

[Bridget Sherlock, dependent mother. Report No. 764, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Soldier was discharged on certificate of disability as result of severe injury received during siege of Corinth, resulting in scrotal hernia and numbness in lower extremities. He did not apply for pension. While in employ of railroad company he fell under the wheels of a train and was injured so that his left foot was amputated. Erysipelas of the blood set in and he died as a result. Approved July 2, 1886.

[Catherine Johnson, widow. Report No. 857, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Soldier reported on muster-roll of company as having drowned himself July 2, 1862. Widow's claim rejected on ground that death was not due to military service. Approved June 24, 1886.

[Forty-ninth Congress, first session. Report No. 306, to accompany bill H. R. 613.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 613) for the relief of Catherine Collins, have examined the same, and report:

The facts are set forth in the annexed report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives (House Report No. 69) during the present session. Upon a careful consideration of them your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mrs. Catherine Collins, dependent mother of John Collins, deceased, filed her application for pension June 7, 1880, which was "rejected on the ground that the death cause, namely, injury from being run over by the cars, was not incurred in line of duty."

The proof shows that John Collins enlisted in Company G, Twenty-sixth Iowa Volunteers, August 9, 1862; was seriously wounded at Arkansas Post, January 11, 1863, in consequence of which he was honorably discharged May 30, 1863. He was placed on the pension-roll December 18, 1863; rate, $8 per month; disability, total—Dr. A. H. Ames, examining surgeon, making the following certificate:

"This applicant was wounded in the left shoulder, the ball entering above the acromion process of the scapula, passing downwards and inwards along the spine of the shoulder-blade, emerging near the spine. The wound has always been open at its exit. Great pain has existed along the course of the ball, and now a fistula extends from the point of exit into the substance of the lungs. His lungs are much diseased in consequence, and he apparently, from the coughing, the pain, and the emaciation consequent upon the suppuration of his wound, will not live long."

On September 8, 1864, he enlisted in the Fourth Independent Company, Veteran Reserve Corps, and, as shown by the records in the War Department, "died February 23, 1866, at Camp Butler, Illinois; run over by cars."

Amasa M. Gregory, agent of the Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific Railway, swears to the following as a correct transcript of accident report made by conductor, February 26, 1866:

"My train, No. 8, of February 21, 1866, leaving Springfield at 5.30 p. m., arrived at — hours — minutes late, delayed from causes as follows:

"When about 2 miles east from Springfield, ran over a man, severing the left leg at the knee. When first seen he was lying on the track, and so covered with mud that the engineer failed to see him until we came so close on him it was impossible to stop. I asked him his name and place of residence; said he belonged to the Invalid Corps, and his name was John Collins. Was not injured in any other place, as I could see.

"C. F. PIERCE, Conductor."

[Forty-ninth Congress, first session. Report No. 332, to accompany bill S. 843.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 843) granting a pension to Elise Burki, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant is the widow of Christian Johann Burki, late captain Company E, Fifteenth Missouri Volunteers. She made application at the Pension Office, but the claim was rejected on the ground that the disease of which the soldier died, cerebral meningitis, was not due to his military service.

It appears that the soldier was pensioned for a gunshot wound in the left leg at $8.50 per month; that he returned to his native country, Switzerland, and died there, April 13, 1873. The widow afterward came to this country, and is now a resident of Washington, D. C. She has called upon members of your committee and made personal statements of her condition. She is in abject poverty, with several small children solely dependent upon her for support. A comrade writes as follows in support of her claim:

"I was well acquainted with said Captain Burki. The last time I saw him was in Berne, Switzerland. He was then complaining about his wound, and said to me, 'Dear friend, this ball in my leg will make me die, sooner or later,' and so it came. He was a good, courageous soldier, and warm patriot for the American Union, a good husband and father. The poor wife and children are utterly in poverty and distress, without work or hope to get some. Shall the wife and children of a glorious defender of our Union be left in such a precarious position?"

The committee answer that by recommending the passage of this bill, believing that, although the evidence of the cause of death is not technical, still it is satisfactory to a reasonable mind, and that the pension should be granted.

[Forty-ninth Congress, first session. Report No. 601, to accompany bill S. 1467.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1467) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Smith, have examined the same, and report:

That the claimant is the widow of Sergt. Joseph Smith, late of Company H, Fourth United States Infantry; Company H, Sixth United States Infantry, and Company B, Tenth Regiment Kansas Volunteers. She made application to the Commissioner of Pensions, but the claim was rejected on the ground "that the soldier's death was not a result of any disease contracted in the United States service."

Sergeant Smith was pensioned October 9, 1850, for injuries of veins of right leg, from long and continuous marches during the war with Mexico. During the rebellion he served from July 26, 1861, to August 8, 1863, when he was discharged for disability. Was restored to the pension-rolls February 18, 1867, to date from his discharge from the volunteer service August 9, 1863, and was a pensioner at date of his death, which occurred August 10, 1881, the cause of death being stated as "old age and chronic disease of liver."

Joseph Smith served in the armies of the United States, volunteer and regular, a period of thirty-two years. He participated in the Florida war, the war with Mexico, and in the war of the rebellion. During his last illness, covering a period of two years and eleven months, he was confined to his bed, and at times not able to move without assistance. The claimant attended him constantly, and as a result is completely broken in health, aged, and unable to earn a living. Her home had to be sold at great loss to enable her to purchase food, medicine, and medical attendance for the soldier.

A number of leading citizens of the city of Leavenworth certify to the respectability of the claimant, and petition Congress to grant her a pension, believing that the soldier's death was indirectly caused by his long and faithful service in the armies of the United States.

Your committee, being of the same opinion, recommend the passage of the bill.

[Forty-ninth Congress, first session. Report No. 603, to accompany bill S. 1586.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1586) granting a pension to Maria Hollands, have examined the same and report:

Joshua Hollands, the husband of the petitioner, was, at the time of his death, receiving a pension of $8 a month for a wound in the wrist received while on detached duty. By the widow it is claimed that this injury was the cause of his death, and in proof she furnishes the affidavit of H. E. Desmond, of Atchison County, Kansas, who testifies that he treated the husband of the applicant continuously for five years previous to his death—

"For nervous prostration, palpitation of the heart, and severe, acute pain in his wounded hand; the effect of which upon his nervous system, through grief, anxiety, and fear, and the functional disturbance of the heart, producing neuralgia of the heart, which was the cause of the soldier's death. The patient being compelled to labor for his support and that of his family, the exertion on his part had a tendency to produce frequent attacks, from one of which he died August 13, 1884."

The medical reviewer of the Pension Office briefly expresses the opinion that there is no connection between the wound and the heart affection.

The difference in the two reports is that the first is careful, candid, and specific, while the second is simply a negative statement.

In the opinion of your committee it is reasonable to infer that the intense suffering of the man by reason of his wound, aggravated by the necessity for using it in his daily toil, may have produced effects which ultimately resulted in his death.

The bill is reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

[Forty-ninth Congress, first session. Report No. 725, to accompany bill H. R. 4960.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4960) granting a pension to Mary S. Webster, have examined the same and report:

Your committee adopt the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives (House Report No. 773), hereto appended, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was favorably reported to the Forty-fifth Congress by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. After a reinvestigation of the case, your committee decide to adopt that report as its own, which is as follows:

"That the said Charles T. Webster enlisted into the military service of the United States in June, 1861. At the battle of Spottsylvania Court-House, in 1864, he lost an arm. For this wound he was discharged and granted a pension, which he continued to draw until he enlisted into the Regular Army, in the Forty-second Regiment United States Army, on the 14th of June, 1867.

"The evidence shows that the claimant was poor, and depended upon the soldier for support.

"After the amputation of his arm he suffered great pain at times, for the relief of which he was accustomed to take opiates.

"On the 9th of January, 1869, his command was stationed at Madison Barracks, New York. On that day he, while suffering the most intense pain from his wound, took a large dose of laudanum, from the effects of which he died.

"The Pension Bureau rejected the claim of his mother for a pension on the ground that the soldier committed suicide.

"The Surgeon-General says, in substance, that it is his opinion that death resulted from his wound which he received in the service and in the line of his duty. He also says that it is well known that in very many cases mutilations received during the war have led to the habitual use of opiates, and death from an overdose taken to relieve pain consequent upon wounds is held as an accidental consequence of such wound.

"The committee are fully satisfied from the evidence that the death of the soldier was not suicidal, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill with amendments, as follows: Strike out, in the fourth line of the bill, all after the word 'pension-roll' to the word 'subject,' in the fifth line; also, all after the word 'infantry,' in the ninth line of the bill."

[Forty-ninth Congress, first session. Report No. 757, to accompany bill H. R. 5655.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5655) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Bell, have examined the same and report:

That after careful examination they have adopted the report of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions, hereto annexed, and recommend the passage of the bill.

That Elizabeth B. Bell is the widow of V. Bradford Bell, late lieutenant Company K, Nineteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, who enlisted in 1861, first call for three-months men, and re-enlisted and served till the close of the war, a period of service extending over five years, and was honorably discharged. He died January 16, 1880, in the city of Detroit, by shooting himself in the head while temporarily insane. His widow now appeals to Congress for relief, for the reason that owing to the manner of her husband's death it can only be granted by special act. She sets forth in her petition that while serving as lieutenant her husband received three gunshot wounds, one in the left foot, one in his right leg, and a third in the head, this latter the most serious, and from the effects of which she attributes his aberration of mind and consequent death.

This wound was received at the battle of Stone River December 31, 1862, the bullet striking him at the outer corner of the right eye, making an indentation in the skull, glancing around the head, and coming out about an inch back of the left ear. This wound partially obscured the vision of the right eye and seriously affected his brain, especially bringing on at times the most intense pains in the head, with aberration of mind and deep melancholy with suicidal tendencies. While in one of these periods of intense pain, from which he could get no relief, he put an end to his sufferings, as stated above.

Maj. James V. Guthrie testifies:

"I was major of the Nineteenth Illinois Infantry, and was with my regiment at the battle of Stone River, December 31, 1862. Vincent B. Bell was second lieutenant Company K, and commanded his company in the action. Lieutenant Bell received a severe wound in the head and fell insensible. He was hit over the eye, the bullet passing around under the skin, coming out at the back of the neck. I saw him hit, and supposed him instantly killed. We lost the position, and Lieutenant Bell was left as killed in the hands of the enemy. This was about noon. Toward evening he was found by a Confederate officer and taken to a log hut, with other wounded officers, his parole demanded, which others gave, but which he refused, saying he would not give his parole on the field. That night he came into our lines and was brought to his regiment and ordered to hospital. Lieutenant Bell was one of the bravest men I ever knew, and a very capable and efficient officer. Several times he was noticed for his courage and judgment."

R. G. Bogue, M. D., testifies:

"He was a surgeon of Nineteenth Illinois Volunteers; knew Lieutenant Bell to have been a well man while in the regiment up to the time of the battle of Murfreesborough or Stone River, at which time he received a gunshot wound of the head, in one temple; he does not remember which. He apparently recovered from said wound, as he served with him afterwards."

Sarah B. Cushing testifies as follows:

"I am the sister of Lieut. V. Bradford Bell, and was in Nashville, Tenn., when he was brought in from the battle-field of Stone River wounded in the head, from which I know he always suffered, and I believe caused his death."

From an article published in Every Saturday, January 24, 1880, we make the following extract:

"Lieutenant Bell won high fame as a fighter. He refused higher rank, even a colonelcy, in other regiments, preferring to remain with the men with whom he had gone out, and many of whom he had induced to enlist. On one occasion, in October, 1862, while serving in Tennessee with a handful of 35 men, he defended a stockade protecting a railroad bridge against a whole regiment of rebel cavalry under command of Colonel Bickwell. In answer to a summons to surrender Lieutenant Bell said his duty and intention were to defend the stockade, and he kept his word. His gallantry on this occasion was rewarded by mention in general orders, and the New York press declared his bravery entitled him to promotion to a brigadier-generalship. Severely wounded at Stone River and Murfreesborough, he was once left for dead upon the field."

Mr. Bell was a man of fine character, great ability, and correct habits. He had a bright and active mind, and was always able to command first-class positions and salary with which to support his wife and child in comfort, for which reason he made no application for pension. His widow further sets forth in her petition that Dr. S. S. Brown, of Detroit, Mich., was their family physician, who attended her husband during the periods of insanity mentioned next preceding his death. Dr. Brown died at Detroit about the year 1882, so that she is unable to get further medical testimony. She further states that she is now poor; is possessed of no property whatever; is dependent upon her own efforts for support of herself and child, a daughter aged fourteen years. It would seem to your committee that in this case of Lieutenant Bell there is an utter lack of any assignable cause other than this wound why he should be subject to these constantly recurring periods of intense pain in the head and resulting melancholy. His health was good before enlisting; his habits good after discharge; his home happy; his occupation pleasant and profitable; his relations, public, private, and social, satisfactory. Judged by all these his life was worth the living. It is, therefore, not unreasonable to suppose that so severe a wound in such a place may have wrecked his life. In consideration of the loss to his wife of so gallant a husband, we recommend that the bill do pass.

[Report No. 763, to accompany bill H. R. 1232.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1232) granting a pension to Eugenia A. Smalley, have examined the same, and report that after careful examinatian they have adopted the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, House of Representatives, hereto annexed, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The applicant, Eugenia A. Smalley, is the widow of Robert Smalley, late a private of Company A, Second Regiment Minnesota Volunteers, who enlisted on the 26th day of June, 1861, and was discharged June 26, 1864.

Soldier received a gunshot wound, passing through the left arm above the elbow into the chest, fracturing two ribs, at the battle of Chickamauga, Ga., on the 20th of September, 1863, and was rated by the Pension Office as totally disabled from manual labor, and pensioned accordingly, which pension he received up to the date of his death, February 21, 1880, caused by a fall from an elevator, where he was engaged at work.

Widow's claim for a pension was rejected on the ground that the cause of soldier's death was the result of a fall from an elevator, on which he was working at the time, and is not attributable to his military service.

Edward Goodboo testifies under oath that he was present at soldier's death, which took place at Rothsay, Wilkin County, Minnesota, February 21, 1880, and that it is his belief that the accident would not have occurred had he not been suffering from the effects of his wounds, which were in his arms and lungs, and which caused soldier great pain, causing him to complain greatly, and he believes that the pain from the wounds caused him to be crazy at times, and thinks that his fall must have been the result of one of these crazy spells getting the best of him, so as to lose all control of himself. He further states that the wound in his arm was at the time of soldier's death a running sore, and that soldier died in about one minute after he struck the ground.

Frank G. Willsey, in his testimony, corroborates the former witness, and adds that he was surprised that said Smalley was able to do any work, he being so badly wounded, and he verily believes that soldier's wounds were the cause of his fall, as it would be impossible for a man shot as he was to have complete use of his arms and shoulder. Soldier did not have full use of his arms on account of said wounds.

The widow is quite poor, with two small children dependent upon her for support.

Your committee are of the opinion that while soldier did not die directly from the wounds received in battle, they are, however, satisfied that said wounds contributed greatly to the fall which caused his death, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

[Forty-ninth Congress, first session. Report No. 764, to accompany bill H. R. 556.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 556) granting a pension to Bridget Sherlock, have examined the same, and report that after careful examination they have adopted the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, House report hereto annexed, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Stephen Sherlock enlisted as a private soldier in Company F, Fifteenth Indiana Volunteers, on the 14th day of June, 1861, and served as such until the 23d day of November, 1862, when he was honorably discharged by the order of General Rosecrans upon a certificate of disability given to him as the result of a severe injury received during the siege of Corinth, "resulting in scrotal hernia, and numbness and difficulty in using the lower extremities. His case is one of very bad scrotal hernia, caused by a fall over a log, May 10, 1862, in front of Corinth, while carrying a heavy load of rails upon his shoulder for the purpose of building a road over which to pass the artillery and wagons during that memorable siege."

The above is the language of the certificate. He was the son of Patrick and Bridget Sherlock, who were at the time of his enlistment quite old and feeble, and depended largely upon said Stephen for a support. After his discharge he returned to the home of his parents, at Bedford, Ind., and within a few months took employment on the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railroad as the conductor of a freight train. It is clearly shown by the testimony of the family physician that his disability continued until his death, and that it had approached a condition of paralysis that would probably have rendered him totally helpless.

While in the employ of the railroad company, as aforesaid, in leaving the train, and because of his disability contracted in the Army, he fell under the wheels of the train and was so injured that his left foot was amputated. By reason of the weak and enfeebled condition of his blood erysipelas resulted, and he died of that disease.

Because he did not die of the injury which he received in the Army his mother's claim for pension was rejected. His father is dead, and his mother is now nearly eighty years of age and has no property. The evidence of her dependence at the time of his death is clear and convincing.

This committee think that, under all the circumstances, she should be pensioned. If the son had not met his death he would have been pensioned long ago upon the record made by the Government as to his injury in the service. He did not get any pension; his mother should, and the committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

[Forty-ninth Congress, first session. Report No. 857, to accompany bill H. R. 3906.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3906) granting a pension to Catherine Johnson, have examined the same, and report that after careful examination they have adopted the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, House of Representatives, hereto annexed, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The claimant is the widow of Zachariah Johnson, who enlisted in Company C, Sixtieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, at Evansville, Ind., December 3, 1861. The Adjutant-General reports that upon special muster-roll of August 18, 1862, the soldier is reported as having drowned himself in Green River, Kentucky, July 2, 1862, while insane.

The widow's claim, filed June 6, 1863, has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the evidence fails to show that the soldier's death is chargeable to his military service.

Captain Nash, of the company, testifies that in April, 1862, the soldier was granted a sick furlough to return to his home in Posey County, Indiana, and that while returning to his command from said furlough was drowned in Green River, Kentucky; remembers distinctly the granting of this furlough, and knows it was in April, 1862, but can not now fix definitely the date of the month. He further states that on several occasions during the latter part of his service in the company soldier exhibited signs of insanity, and had on one occasion attempted to take his life by cutting his throat, and believes that he drowned himself in a fit of delirium.

William Ouman testifies that he was with the soldier on his return to the regiment, and that on July 2, 1862, near Ashbysburgh, Ky., on Green River, Kentucky, the latter was ordered by the affiant, acting as sergeant, in command of the squad, down said river in a skiff to ascertain the location of certain of the enemy's forces reported in that vicinity. The skiff was afterwards found containing the soldier's blouse, but soldier did not turn up, and it was the general belief that he was then and there drowned. Being compelled to move on next morning, no search was made for the body. Affiant also corroborates the statement of Captain Nash as to Johnson's mental condition a short time previous to the supposed drowning.

Col. Richard Owen and twelve other officers and enlisted men of the soldier's command testify that they were well acquainted with him prior to his enlistment; that he was a good citizen, and a good and faithful soldier while with his command, and of amiable disposition, strongly attached to his family and home; that they have every reason to believe that he was drowned while in a boat on Green River, Kentucky, in July, 1862, and that had he been alive subsequent to that date he would have returned to his family.

Sixty-five other citizens of Posey County, Indiana, testify to the high character of the soldier and of his widow, and asked that a pension be granted to her, she being old and in need of assistance from the Government.

Your committee have given the evidence above referred to careful consideration, and have become fully convinced that the soldier came to his death while returning to his command from sick leave, and while actually obeying the order of his superior officer. Whether the drowning was accidental or of his own act must necessarily remain in doubt, although the evidence points toward the latter.

The claimant is evidently worthy of the relief asked for, and having lost the support of a kind and affectionate husband while in the service of his country, your committee believe that she is entitled to the benefit of whatever doubts may exist in the case, and therefore report favorably on the bill and ask that it do pass.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I report from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes. As it is important that this bill should pass finally before the 1st of July, I shall ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], about 4 o'clock to-day, to give way that I may endeavor to secure its passage this afternoon. In the mean time it will be printed with the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Meanwhile the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, in connection with the request of the Senator from Iowa, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] are both present, to ask an indication of the desire of the Senate as to the time of proceeding with the fisheries treaty. I have the floor on that question and propose to address the Senate when it is taken up. I do not wish to interfere with other public business or with the desire of other Senators, but I should like very well to know the purpose of the Senate. I am prepared to proceed this morning, but if I should do so it would displace the river and harbor bill and would interfere with the request of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SHERMAN. What time would best suit the Senator's convenience?

Mr. HOAR. Any time that will be convenient to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Suppose we put it off until next Monday?

Mr. HOAR. That would be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. ALLISON. I think, if the Senator from Massachusetts desires to proceed uninterruptedly, it would be better to postpone until Monday the subject on which he wishes to speak, because during the remainder of this week there will undoubtedly be intervals of conference reports, appropriations bills, and so on.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the river and harbor bill should not be finished by next Monday, would it be convenient to the Senator from Maine to have me proceed then?

Mr. FRYE. I shall be obliged to ask the Senate to proceed with the river and harbor bill to its completion this week at any rate, as I have an imperative engagement that will take me away nearly all of next week.

Mr. HOAR. Then, if it will be agreeable to the Senate, I will ask that the fisheries treaty be set down for consideration next Monday at the conclusion of the routine morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the treaty having been assigned for Monday last, were informally laid aside to wait the convenience of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. He now asks unanimous consent that the consideration may be resumed on Monday next at 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. The suggestion was that it be resumed at the conclusion of the routine business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the conclusion of the routine business on Monday next.

Mr. MORGAN. That would place the consideration of the treaty ahead of my resolutions, and I can not consent to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, put them both together.

Mr. HOAR. Both together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The agreement was that the precedence in point of time of the assignment should continue undisturbed.

Mr. MORGAN. The resolutions coming up at the conclusion of the routine business of the morning hour would naturally have precedence over the treaty for consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. Both will be considered together and both will be disposed of together. I do not think the Senator need be technical about it.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to disturb any desire of the Senator from Alabama. Of course it makes no difference which I shall speak on.

Mr. MORGAN. Well let them stand.

Mr. HOAR. Let them stand together as they do now.

Mr. MORGAN. Just as they now stand until next Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The understanding, then, is, by unanimous consent, that the consideration of the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama and the fisheries treaty will be resumed at the conclusion of the routine morning business on Monday. Reports of committees are still in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAWLEY. I report, by instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, an amendment intended to be proposed to the Army appropriation bill. I understand that the bill has been reported this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Army appropriation bill was reported this morning, and the Senator from Iowa gave notice that he would call it up for consideration at 4 o'clock to-day.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let the proposed amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations without printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

R. 2952) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1885, known as the Bowman act; which were referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed, and the Calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of what is known as the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, after line 834, the Committee on Commerce report to insert:

Improving Yadkin River, North Carolina, $10,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered on agreeing to the amendment, the roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], but I understood yesterday from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce that the Senator from Illinois, who is a member of that committee, would vote "yea" on this amendment. I therefore vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware will be recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], and therefore shall not vote.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I understand that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], with whom I am paired, would vote "yea" on this proposition. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). I was paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] the last time he was here, and I suppose he may consider that I am so paired now. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY. I am assured by friends that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE] would vote "yea" if he were here. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM. I designed to submit a statement in reference to the amendment just passed, but the commencement of the roll-call anticipated me. I beg leave to have put in the RECORD the local engineer's report on this improvement and the recommendation and estimates of the Chief Engineer of the United States, as taken from the report of the Secretary of War for 1887. I will also put in the RECORD the preliminary survey of the Yadkin River "from the South Carolina line to the Narrows," made by the local engineer upon a part of the river entirely distinct and separate from that part which is under improvement, so that there may be no confusion in reference to the two subjects, and that the impression produced by the preliminary survey of one section of the river may not prejudice the improvement which has been going on for nine years upon another part of the river, and for which the local and Chief Engineers have made their recommendation and estimates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will indicate in the volume the portion he desires to have incorporated, and it will be done.

The extracts referred to are as follows:

11. Yadkin River, North Carolina (in charge of Capt. F. A. Hinman, Corps of Engineers, until August 11, 1886): This river has a total length of about 200 miles and a drainage area of 4,320 square miles. Its middle third, extending from the railroad bridge near Salisbury, 64½ miles upward to the foot of Bean Shoal, is the only portion so far under improvement by the General Government. In this portion of the Yadkin River, prior to improvement in 1880, navigation was completely obstructed by rock ledges, fish and mill dams, and numerous shoals, with a greatest depth of 1 foot at ordinary low water on some of its shoals and ledges.

The original project of 1879 proposed for $82,000 to secure a 2.5 to 3 foot steamboat navigation during the entire year over the 64½ miles above the Salisbury railroad bridge. For various reasons, as detailed by the officer in charge, the estimates for the final cost of the work necessary to give the desired depth over the entire 64½ miles and during only mean winter stages of water (two-thirds of the year) are now placed by him at $400,000.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, no work was done before October, 1886, on account of lack of funds. After that time $8,650, including outstanding liabilities, was spent in thoroughly repairing the plant, in removing the rock and sand from the channel, in building jetties, in carefully surveying various ledges and dams, in caring for the property, and in office work. All work of clearing the river channel was prevented before June, 1887, by high water.

Up to June 30, 1887, a total of $77,265.90 has been spent in all upon this improvement in securing a good channel for flat-boats (and only an indifferent channel for steam-boats) of 40 to 70 feet width and from 2 to 2½ feet depth during mean winter stages of water (eight months of the year) from the Salisbury Railroad bridge 21 miles upwards to above Swicegood's mill. No river commerce has yet been created, and none is expected until the improvement reaches Bailey's Ferry, 35 miles above the Salisbury Railroad bridge.

EXAMINATION OF YADKIN RIVER, FROM SOUTH CAROLINA LINE TO THE NARROWS, NORTH CAROLINA.

WILMINGTON, N. C., December 15, 1887.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a final report upon the examination of the Yadkin River, North Carolina, from the South Carolina line to the Narrows, assigned to me by river and harbor act of August 5, 1886, and letters from your office dated September 27, October 4, and October 28, 1886.

Upon the 4th February, 1887, I submitted a preliminary report upon this examination, in which I stated the general features of the river, the estimated cost of its improvement, and the necessities of neighboring communities, and my opinion as to the probable advantages of the improvement of the river, as based upon previous reports and upon information obtained from persons living along the river.

Since the date of this preliminary report I have examined the river in person, in a small row-boat, over the entire length above specified, and at a time when the water was at nearly its lowest stage. The middle portion of this river, from the Grassy Island Shoals upward 16 miles, was found to be comparatively level, and in itself could be easily made navigable at low water for boats drawing 4 feet; but there would be no way of connecting this navigation to other navigable parts of the river below, or even to nearest railroad, except at a cost to-day out of proportion to the resulting benefits. The rest of this river, the general features of the whole river, the cost of its improvement, and the statistics of commerce were found to be practically as already described in the preliminary report, to which you are referred for fuller details.

In my opinion this river basin is one of considerable water-power and of great agricultural wealth, but at the same time one which is at present best adapted to development by the construction of a railroad up its valley, instead of by the improvement of its water ways. Moreover, the people along the river appear anxious to have an open passage cut through the existing fish-dams, more to allow fish to ascend the river than to facilitate the river commerce.

Since making the above-described examination, I have visited other rivers of similar nature, upon which there already exists a more or less successful pole-boat navigation.

As a result of all these examinations, I am now of the opinion that the steep descent of the Yadkin River, its comparatively small volume of water at ordinary stages, and its large extent of rocky bottom render any extended navigation of this river impracticable except by the aid of locks and dams and the extensive removal of rocks between these dams; that the cost of any such improved navigation (even for rafts and barges) is here altogether too great (see preliminary report), in comparison with the advantages to be derived therefrom, until the mineral resources of the river basin are much more fully developed than at present; and that under these circumstances this river, within the limits of the prescribed examination, is not to-day worthy of improvement by the General Government.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. H. BIXBY,
Captain of Engineers.

The CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, U. S. A.

CONDITION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the indulgence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] for just a moment. I have requested the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ALLISON] to make a statement to the Senate in regard to the present condition of the appropriation bills, and it will occupy I suppose only a very few moments. I should like it to go into the RECORD for the information of the Senate and the country. If the Senator from Maine will indulge me just for one moment I will ask the Senator from Iowa to make a statement in regard to the present condition of the appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLISON. I can state in a moment the exact condition of these bills. The West Point appropriation bill, the Indian appropriation bill, and the pension appropriation bill have passed both Houses, and I believe have been signed by the President, making three of the regular bills which are completed. The agricultural appropriation bill passed the Senate on the 14th of June, and since that time has not been heard from. I think it is in the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives. The diplomatic and consular appropriation bill is in conference. The District of Columbia appropriation bill is also in conference. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill passed the Senate the day before yesterday; it will be reported back to the House of Representatives to-day, and I presume can be passed finally within the next two or three days. The Post-Office appropriation bill passed the Senate on the 14th of June, and has not since been heard from. The Army appropriation bill was reported this morning, and I hope to have it passed during the day. The sundry civil bill came to the Senate day before yesterday. Of course it will be impossible to consider and pass that bill before the 30th of June. So of the Naval appropriation bill, which came to the Senate on Monday last; it will be impossible to complete that bill before the 1st of July. The fortification bill has not yet been reported in the House of Representatives, nor has the general deficiency bill; so that it will be necessary to pass a joint resolution either on Friday or Saturday to extend the appropriations for the current year a certain number of days.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

OHIO CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. ALLISON, Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. COLQUITT, and Mr. BERRY members on the part of the Senate of the committee of Congress authorized by the act approved May 23, 1888, to attend the Centennial Exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7901) to secure to actual settlers the public lands adapted to agriculture, to protect the forests on the public domain, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. Before proceeding with the reading of the bill, I beg to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a mistake in the amendment which was adopted yesterday in regard to Winyaw Bay. The amendment refers to the report of Captain Bixby of October 26, 1884. I am informed this morning from the War Department that the date should have been January 31, 1885. It is a mere mistake of date.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that that amendment may be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 375, strike out "October 26, 1884," and insert "January 31, 1885;" so as to read:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to appoint a board of three engineer officers of the United States Army, whose duty it shall be to examine into the expediency of improving Winyaw Bay, South Carolina, upon the plan submitted by Capt. William H. Bixby, United States Army Engineers, under date of January 31, 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 841, after "South Carolina," to strike out "Continuing" and insert "To complete;" and in line 842, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Salkehatchee River, South Carolina: To complete improvement, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 845, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Of which as much as may be necessay is hereby authorized to be expended in acquiring, by purchase or condemnation, the right of way for cut-offs along said river, pursuant to the plan and recommendation of the engineer in charge.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving Santee River, South Carolina: Continuing improvement, $24,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after "South Carolina," at the end of line 850, to insert "to Waccamaw Lake, North Carolina;" and in line 852, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Waccamaw River, North and South Carolina, to Waccamaw Lake, North Carolina: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad if the chairman of the committee would favor me with some explanation of the reason of the committee in striking out $15,000 and inserting $10,000. In the estimate made for this work, as I now remember, it was stated that $48,000 could be advantageously expended during the fiscal year. The amount appropriated has been cut down by the committee from $15,000 to $10,000. In the absence of any explanation, I shall move to non-concur in the amendment. In fact, I may as well make a motion that the Senate disagree to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question properly to be submitted is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee, and a negative vote will leave the appropriation to stand as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. BUTLER. I trust that will be done and that the amendment of the committee will be rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 9, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. FRYE. I think I must ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I wanted the Senator to explain why that was done. I am quite willing to acquiesce if there is sufficient reason for it.

Mr. FRYE. We increased two or three items in South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain debate when the absence of a quorum has been disclosed. There were but 21 votes on a division of the Senate. It is the duty of the Chair to have the roll called; but the Senator from Maine can ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not ask for a further count, and I do not suppose anybody else will.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to introduce a bill for reference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not receive it while no quorum is present. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. FRYE. I shall not demand the yeas and nays on the amendment. I can not afford to stop the bill for this little item.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division has resulted in the disclosure of a want of a quorum.

Mr. RANSOM. There is evidently a quorum in the Chamber.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the vote be taken over again.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent that the chairman of the committee may make some explanation of the amendment. I am not disposed to be factious about it, and yet I can not understand why that particular river should have been selected for a reduction when the appropriations made by the House for others were increased. If there is any reasonable explanation about it, I am quite willing to acquiesce in the report of the committee. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Maine may be allowed to explain the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Less than a quorum of the Senate can not give unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that the demand for a division has been withdrawn. I think we had better have a quorum, anyhow. Let us have the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the yeas and nays may be entered on the Journal upon the question of agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now the Senator from Maine will be in order.

Mr. FRYE. The rule adopted generally by the House committee was to appropriate to rivers that were entitled to improvement, in their judgment, from 44 to 50 per cent. of the amount which the Chief Engineer determined could be profitably expended for the year. Of course the committee were compelled to vary that in important cases. But the amount in this case which it was determined by the Chief Engineer could be profitably expended was only $18,000. One-half of that is $9,000. The Senate committee could see no earthly reason why the House committee dropped their rule in the case of this river and made the appropriation $15,000 instead of $9,000, and therefore, coming nearer to the rule than the other House, it appropriated $10,000, which is a little more than one-half the amount recommended by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. BUTLER. The explanation of the chairman of the committee is entirely satisfactory to me. I was not informed as to those facts. The information that I had was that the amount which could be profitably expended was $48,000, and I was not aware of it until this morning from the last report of the War Department I ascertained that $18,000 was the amount specified. I think the committee have provided amply for the river, and I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina withdraws the demand for the yeas and nays, and, the Chair having ascertained that a quorum is present, the question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 854, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Wappoo Cut, South Carolina: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 856, to add to the clause appropriating $12,000 for "improving Wateree River, South Carolina: Continuing improvement," the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of said appropriation shall be expended until the Wilmington, Columbia and Augusta Railroad Company, and the Camden branch of the South Carolina Railroad Company shall have built suitable draw-spans in their bridges over said river, to be approved by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 863, to add to the clause appropriating $7,500 for "improving Congaree River, South Carolina: Continuing improvement," the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of said appropriation shall be expended until the South Carolina Railroad Company shall have built a suitable draw-span in its bridge over said river, to be approved by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 885, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "seven;" and after the word "thousand" to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Ocmulgee River, Georgia: Continuing improvement, $7,500.

Mr. BROWN. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I simply want to submit a short statement of facts to the committee. I do not want to make any issue with them, but there were important facts that they did not have before them I am quite sure, when the House appropriation of $15,000 was cut down.

The Ocmulgee River is one branch of the Altamaha. The Oconee is the other branch. They form a junction near Lumber City, in Georgia, forming the Altamaha. The Ocmulgee is the southern branch of the stream. There is a railroad, which has been constructed within the last two years, and completed to the Ocmulgee River within the last two or three months, 110 miles along through the Southwest Georgia pine and cotton country, that now has its depot upon the bank of the Ocmulgee at the town of Abbeville.

This opens a regular line of railroad and water communication from the southwestern part of Georgia to Brunswick, which is much shorter than any other one of the lines. The line is now established and has prorating rates with the other railroads.

At the time the engineer made the estimate of $15,000 for the Ocmulgee that road was not completed to Abbeville. It has only reached there within the last six weeks or two months, as I am informed.

The river has been an important river, and was so regarded by the State of Georgia prior to the war. The State, as will be seen by the report of the committee, has expended out of her own treasury $60,000 for the improvement of this river. The United States Government took charge of the matter after the war, and has made considerable expenditure. I am informed by Judge CRISP, who represents this measure in the House of Representatives, as it is in his district, that the amount which is now estimated for would be entirely inadequate, that there are five river steamers being now constructed to run upon that line, and that two have been wrecked on account of the bad condition of the river in the last year. It is therefore no sham line, and it is no very small river. The completion of the railroad to the river connecting Southwestern Georgia, as I have already stated, makes it really one of the most important connections in Georgia. The amount of $15,000 which was put in the bill by the House of Representatives was put there with an understanding of these facts, and I think in all candor it ought to be permitted to remain.

To cut it down $7,500 now, leaving only $7,500 of the $15,000, would leave the appropriation entirely inadequate to do what is very necessary to be done to encourage a rapidly growing line, and one that is going to be very important to commerce. I appeal to the committee to make no objection to voting down the amendment proposed by them.

In case of the other river I mentioned, the Oconee, the committee also make a reduction, but I make no point on that.

Mr. FRYE. I stated when I was up before that the committee had generally a rule which was 50 per cent. of the amount recommended for expenditure, but that they violated the rule in exceptional cases, and in the State of Georgia they have violated it by giving at least $110,000 additional to Savannah. Therefore it is but fair that the State of Georgia shall be held to the rule so far as the other rivers are concerned, and this is just one-half of the amount which the Chief Engineer said could be profitably expended.

Mr. BROWN. In that connection I will say that the estimate on the old project for Savannah Harbor was $180,000, and the estimate on the new was $200,000. So I do not think it can be said that there was a great addition to Savannah. Savannah certainly does not get as much in proportion to her commercial importance as some other cities. Still I have no complaint of the committee on that account. I only make the appeal to the Senate in view of the facts I have stated in regard to the Ocmulgee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 887, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twelve" and insert "ten;" after the word "thousand" to strike out "five hundred;" and in line 889, before the word "railroad," to insert "Georgia;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Oconee River, Georgia: Continuing improvement, $10,000; a portion of which may be expended on said river between Skull Shoals and the Georgia Railroad bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 895, to insert:

That the sum of $4,632.77 is hereby appropriated for completing the existing project at Romerly Marsh, in the State of Georgia, to be paid to the contractors for completing the job.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 903, after the word "Florida," to strike out "Continuing" and insert "To complete;" in line 904, after the word "improvement," to insert "of upper river," and in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "ten;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Caloosahatchie River, Florida: To complete improvement of upper river, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I would like to insert after the word "river," in line 904, the words "including the lower river bar, in the discretion of the Secretary of War." This does not vary the amount allowed, but allows the Engineer Department to have a discretion in expending a part of the $10,000 on the lower river. There has been an estimate and a survey, and it may be important that some portion of the money should be expended there.

Mr. FRYE. The committee examined that with some little care, and thought it was a great deal better to complete the improvement of the upper river.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator that it would be better to allow the Secretary of War and the Engineer Department who expend the money to have some discretion in its use.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Florida ought to be satisfied with the item. The appropriation came from the House $4,000 for that whole river. The committee examined the matter and found that a portion of the river could be completed for $10,000, and they increased the appropriation to $10,000 to complete it; and the Senator from Florida ought to be content.

Mr. CALL. I do not quarrel with the amendment as to the amount; but I think I am right in suggesting that the discretion of the Secretary of War and the Engineer Bureau in expending the money should not be interfered with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to go back to line 896. I ask the Senator from Georgia if "Romerly Marsh" is the correct name?

Mr. BROWN. It is correct.

Mr. FRYE. At the end of the clause the phrase "for completing the job" occurs. I do not exactly like that language. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the word "job" and insert "improvement."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be agreed to, if there be no objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 914, after the word "improving," to strike out "channel over the bar at the mouth of;" in line 915, after the word "Florida," to insert "from Jacksonville to the ocean," and in the same line to strike out "continuing improvement;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving St. John's River, Florida, from Jacksonville to the ocean, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Maine to allow an amendment of the clause, beginning in line 910, by adding at the end of the clause the words:

Including Holmes River to the town of Vernon.

So that it will read:

Improving La Grange Bayou, Florida: To complete, $3,000; including Holmes River to the town of Vernon.

Steamers bring the produce of that section of country to La Grange, and this money should be left in the discretion of the Secretary of War to improve the continuation of the bayou.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator inform me whether or not the $3,000 will complete the work as provided for here?

Mr. CALL. I can not say in regard to that. You might strike out the words "to complete." The appropriation has been made in small sums for several years, and a very good purpose has been served.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to the amendment allowing the words "To complete" to stand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Florida send his proposed amendment to the desk, or repeat it so that it may be heard at the desk and taken down?

Mr. CALL. I will send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to add, at the end of line 911, the words:

Including Holmes River to the town of Vernon.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving La Grange Bayou, Florida: To complete, $3,000; including Holmes River to the town of Vernon.

Mr. VEST. Is that connected with La Grange Bayou?

Mr. FRYE. The item stands "To complete," the Senator from Missouri will notice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 931, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Black Warrior River, Alabama, from Tuscaloosa to Daniel's Creek: Continuing improvement, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 936 and 937 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Tombigbee River, Alabama, from Walker's Bridge to Fulton, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 939, after the word "Vienna," to strike out "Continuing" and insert "To complete;" before the word "thousand," in line 940, to strike out "six" and insert "twelve;" and after "thousand" to strike out "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Tombigbee River, Alabama, from Fulton to Vienna: To complete improvement, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 942, before the word "improvement," to strike out "Continuing" and insert "To complete;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Tombigbee River, Alabama, below Vienna: To complete improvement, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 967 and 968 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Yallabusha River, Mississippi: Continuing improvement, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 973 and 974 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Cassity Bayou, Mississippi, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, to strike out the clause from line 975 to line 977, inclusive, as follows:

Improving Amite River, Louisiana: Continuing improvement, $5,000, of which $2,500 may be used in improving Bayou Manchac.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 980 and 981 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Bayou Bartholomew, Louisiana and Arkansas: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. GIBSON. In this item only $5,000 is asked for Bayou Bartholomew. I find, on examination of the report of the engineer, that—

This stream is a tributary of Ouachita River. It rises in Southeastern Arkansas, within a few miles of Pine Bluff, on the Arkansas River, and following an exceedingly tortuous course, flows at first nearly parallel to the Arkansas River, at a distance varying from 15 to 30 miles, then parallel to the Mississippi at about the same average distance, and after entering Louisiana diverges to the southwest and flows into the Ouachita River opposite Ouachita City.

The improvement was begun in 1881 and consisted in the removal of wrecks, snags, overhanging timber, etc., obstructing navigation between Baxter, Ark., and the mouth, a distance estimated at 213 miles. In all $23,000 have been appropriated, and up to June 30, $21,116.55 had been expended. It is estimated that $6,500 will complete the projected work. The expenditure already made has resulted in putting the bayou in good navigable condition during high and medium stages of water from its mouth up to Point Pleasant, La., a distance of 50 miles.

During the past year three steam-boats, drawing from 3 to 5 feet, were running regularly upon the river for five months, and the commerce was valued at $1,075,000.

I think a good case is made for the retention of this item.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. The last report says:

The estimated cost was given at $26,862, but this estimate was based upon a plan of operations for twelve months, or two consecutive seasons' work, whereas, owing to the small amounts appropriated, operations have now extended over six years. For this reason the cost of the work will be increased, as new obstructions are continually forming, and after the work is thoroughly completed these will require removal from time to time; hence no estimate for permanent improvement is given.

This is one of those places—there are several of these bayous in Louisiana—where the engineers report that it is impossible to make any permanent improvement.

Mr. GIBSON. An improvement can be made with a very small expenditure and kept in running order. I have read from the report of the chairman of the committee himself. The engineer says here:

It is estimated that $6,500 will complete the projected work.

The work has been going on for some time, and it ought to be continued.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I hope that the suggestion of the Senator from Louisiana will be adopted. I know something from personal observation of Bayou Bartholomew. It drains a very rich country, but the current is exceedingly sluggish in the spring. It has a deep, narrow channel, and in a narrow stream there is considerable difficulty in navigation on account of overhanging timber. Much of the improvement has been in clearing the overhanging timber away and getting out snags and timber that has fallen into the current.

The character of the work done must necessarily, with the limited appropriations, be merely getting timber out of the channel and getting the overhanging timber off the banks of the stream. The work that has been done has improved the navigation of that stream very much, and I hope it will be continued. I regard the money expended there as of as much value as on many others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee, to strike out lines 980 and 981.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out lines 982 and 983 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Bayou Courtableau, Louisiana: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 986 and 987 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Bayou Terre Bonne, Louisiana: To complete, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, before the word "thousand," in line 996, to strike out "sixty-five" and insert "fifty-five;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Of which $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used upon Cypress Bayou and the lakes between Shreveport, La., and Jefferson, Tex.; and $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, upon Bayou Dorcheat.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving Red River, Louisiana and Arkansas: Continuing improvement from Fulton, Ark., to Atchafalaya River, including completing the work at Alexandria, $55,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of the item on page 42, ending in line 1005, "for improving Ouachita and Black Rivers, Louisiana."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I suggest to the chairman that if the report of the committee is right the words "Arkansas and" should be inserted before "Louisiana," for the reason that the Ouachita and Black Rivers proposed to be improved in this clause begin in Arkansas, and 60 or 70 miles of the length of river proposed to be treated, as I understand, are in the State of Arkansas. I think, to carry out the purpose, these words should be inserted.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator knows that to be the fact, I have no objection to the amendment he suggests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed is in line 1001, after the word "rivers," to insert "Arkansas and;" so as to read:

Improving Ouachita and Black Rivers, Arkansas and Louisiana, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out lines 1006 and 1007 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Tickfaw River and its navigable tributaries, Louisiana: Continuing improvement, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 1008 and 1009 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Little River, Louisiana, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the clause from line 1012 to line 1014 of section 1, inclusive, as follows:

Improving Calcasieu River and passes, Louisiana: Continuing improvement at the entrance to said river and pass, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 1021 to line 1025 of section 1, inclusive, as follows:

Improving Bayou Lafourche, Louisiana, pursuant to the project of Lieut. O. T. Crosby, Corps of Engineers, dated June 11, 1886, $50,000, including immediate dredging to secure low-water navigation.

Mr. GIBSON. I move to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out by making it read:

Improving Bayou Lafourche, Louisiana: For dredge-boats and dredging to secure low-water navigation, $25,000.

I think the chairman of the committee will accept that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will please send the proposed amendment to the desk.

Mr. GIBSON. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out lines 1021 to 1025, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof:

Improving Bayou Lafourche, Louisiana: For dredge-boats and dredging to secure low-water navigation, $25,000.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the committee to accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee to strike out the clause as amended.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1030, after the words "improving Arkansas River, Arkansas," to strike out "continuing improvement" and insert "for the removal of obstructions, bars, and shoals, operating snag-boat, repairing snag-boat Wichita, and general improvements to the navigation of the river, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of War."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I hope that the committee will not insist on striking out the words in lines 1030 and 1031, "Continuing improvement," nor on striking out the words from line 1043 down to line 1063.

The amendment of the committee, beginning on line 1031 and down to line 1043, I think, is exactly right; but I believe that the words already in the clause limiting the appropriation and the purpose the committee had in view in making the appropriation will be more definite and certain by the clause remaining in that shape.

The members of the committee well know the various reports recommending the improvement of the Arkansas River and that the one they propose to follow provides for locks and dams in certain places. The other general plan is one providing for dikes and dams in the narrower channels. The language stricken out by the committee limits the appropriation to exactly the purpose the committee have in view in the language they propose to insert. I think the clause would be in better shape with the language that they have inserted in it than it would be if the House clause was taken as it came to the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator kindly repeat his proposed amendment?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I propose to leave the clause standing, not striking out any part of the item as it came from the other House, but adopting the proposed amendment of the committee so far as the insertion of words is concerned. I think we should insert the words the committee recommend to be inserted, and not strike out the language coming from the House, as they propose in their motion to strike out. For instance, I think the clause should read, in regard to the Arkansas River:

Continuing improvement: For the removal of obstructions, bars, and shoals, etc.

And then should proceed:

Provided, That the Secretary of War shall expend the appropriation under this head with reference to the final improvement of this river as contemplated in the report of the Chief of Engineers for the year ending July 1, 1885, and as authorized in the act for the improvement of rivers and harbors approved August 5, 1886, and in House Executive Document No. 90, Forty-ninth Congress, first session; said methods to be applied, as the Secretary of War may direct, at such points between Wichita, Kans., and the navigable mouth of the Arkansas River, at its junction with the Mississippi River, as he may deem for the best interest of commerce.

The only objection I can see to that language is that it allows the Secretary of War the discretion, if he chooses to do so, to permit a portion of this money to be used on the part of the river from Arkansas City down. The report of the engineer is that the river from Wichita, Kans., to Arkansas City is not feasible of improvement; that in the present requirements of commerce there is no necessity for any expenditure being made on that part of the river, because it is not worthy of improvement at present; but he does recommend an improvement from Arkansas City to the mouth of the river; and in the old report, under which this very plan of improvement has been suggested, the method of narrowing the channel in certain places, the manner of building up dams in a cheap and efficient way, is proposed, which has been tried on the river a number of times. It seems to me to be the part of wisdom that the present appropriation shall be limited to the old plan, and that it shall be followed out, and that there shall be no doubt left as to the intention of Congress in making this appropriation. The engineer earnestly recommends that there shall be a uniform purpose, and that the appropriation as made in the last bill shall be carried out under this.

As the motion to strike out and insert is not divisible by the rules of the Senate, I understand the difficulty I have to deal with, and I appeal to the chairman of the committee to agree that this clause shall be put in this shape. There may be no great harm done in allowing the recommendation of the committee to be carried out exactly as it is made; but it would be safer and this appropriation would be more clearly and distinctly limited to the purpose the committee have in view if the language proposed to be inserted by the committee be inserted and the language recommended by the House committee be allowed to remain in the clause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to strike out and insert may be considered divisible by unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. I do not feel at liberty to give assent to any change in this item. The committee spent a great deal of time over this item; they devoted a good deal of attention to the provisions of it, and the Senator from Arkansas was present and discussed with the committee its provisions, and they finally settled upon the language contained here. I believe it carries out fully and completely the intention of the committee and prevents any adoption of a plan which in the opinion of the committee is altogether too extravagant for this river. The river is an important one. The committee recognize that fact. Its commerce is large. But there is one plan proposed which is excessive and extravagant, and the committee determined that under no circumstances could it be committed to it. It seems to me that the language used here, that was adopted after long discussion and with great care, carries out completely the purpose the committee had in view. Therefore I shall be obliged to object to the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. COKE. When this matter was under consideration the Senator from Arkansas was freely consulted, as I understood, and the provision as placed in the bill by the committee he agreed was right. I know he was there, and my understanding was that he consented to the amendment agreed to by the committee as a reasonable and satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The Senator from Maine and the Senator from Texas do not seem to understand the point I made. I was before the Committee on Commerce and stated to them what my views were about this clause as they originally framed it in the first draught of the bill the committee brought into the Senate. I called their attention to the fact that they were compelling the improvement of the Arkansas River, under a report of the Board of Engineers, from Wichita, Kans., to its mouth, of March 16, 1888; that they did not intend that purpose, and that the reference to the report by its date had committed the committee to a plan of improvement which they did not intend. After I had made my statement the chairman of the committee said, and the members of the committee who were present agreed, that they were satisfied with my purpose, and I heard no more from the committee. I was not present at any of the committee conferences; I heard no discussion among the members of the committee about the effect of this clause.

Now the purpose I have in view is this: I agree with the Senator from Maine that this clause as it is framed prevents the taking up of the plan to which I have just referred and which is in terms excluded by the language of the committee's report; but it does not go quite far enough. I think that the committee ought to be prepared to follow the plan which has been heretofore recommended, which has been heretofore adopted, and upon which the appropriations that have been made prior to this time have been expended.

There is a declaration in the clause, if it shall be passed as the committee recommend it, that it will not follow the recommendation made by the board of the date mentioned, which would be enormously expensive; but it does not at the same time say that it will adhere to the old plan and continue the improvement on the plan that has been adopted heretofore. Of course I take it for granted the Secretary of War will in all probability take this view of it, that Congress having declared it will not accept the new plan he should follow the old plan; but I submit to the chairman of the committee that it would be well to say in exact words that you expect this appropriation to be expended in the line that appropriations made heretofore have been expended and there shall be no change from the plan as recommended by the Engineer Department and adopted by the House committee.

Mr. BERRY. I was before the committee and had a conversation with the chairman and other members, and I agree with my colleague that the object to be accomplished will be best attained by keeping in the language reported and also retaining the House language.

I understand the purpose of the committee was to prevent the Government being committed to the new plan. The amendment proposed by the committee does exclude that plan; but my colleague thinks it goes further than that, and might possibly be construed to exclude another plan and one which we all agreed, as I thought, the committee as well as all the rest, should be adopted. My colleague, who had something to do with preparing the words of the bill as it came from the other House, said that the purpose was to exclude the plan to which the Senator from Maine has alluded, and simply give force to the other plan which has been already pursued.

Mr. FRYE. I am entirely willing to restore the words "continuing improvement," in lines 1030 and 1031, but I can not see why the clause as reported does not do everything that the two Senators desire:

For the removal of obstructions, bars, and shoals, operating snag-boat, repairing snag-boat Wichita, and general improvements to the navigation of the river, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

I do not see the least difficulty in this language allowing the Secretary of War to continue the improvement that he has been making heretofore.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Restoring the words "continuing improvement," I think, will go very far to indicate to the Secretary of War that the old plan shall be pursued.

Mr. FRYE. I am willing that those words shall remain.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. That almost meets my idea, but I believe a direct declaration that the old plan shall be pursued would be still better.

Mr. VEST. My construction of this amendment is that the matter shall be left entirely to the discretion of the Engineer Bureau. It is not proposed to commit them to any plan. The distinct understanding, as I recollect, was that the Engineer Bureau should go on with the improvement of the river according to the plan that they might see fit to adopt. The language here can admit of no other construction; it is for continuing the improvement of the river, and we did not propose to commit ourselves to the old plan or the new.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that by unanimous consent the words, "Continuing improvement," in lines 1030 and 1031 are to remain in the bill. The question then recurs upon agreeing to the further amendment proposed by the committee, to insert the words printed in italics from line 1031 to line 1035, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the words "Continuing improvement," in line 1031, on page 43, the Committee on Commerce propose to insert:

For the removal of obstructions, bars, and shoals, operating snag-boat, repairing snag-boat Wichita, and general improvements to the navigation of the river, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in the same clause, line 1035, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

To be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of War, $175,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, after the word "dollars," at the end of line 1035, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the Secretary of War to enter upon the project of improvement of said river as set forth in the report of the Board of Engineers on improvement of the Arkansas River from Whicita, Kans., to its mouth, dated New York City, March 16, 1888, and contained in House Executive Document No. 234, first session, Fiftieth Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, after the word "Congress," in line 1043, to strike out:

Provided, That the Secretary of War shall expend the appropriation under this head with reference to the final improvement of this river as contemplated in the report of the Chief of Engineers for the year ending July 1, 1885, and as authorized in the act for the improvement of rivers and harbors, approved August 5, 1886, and in House Executive Document No. 90, Forty-ninth Congress, first session; said methods to be applied, as the Secretary of War may direct, at such points between Wichita, Kans., and the navigable mouth of the Arkansas River, at its junction with the Mississippi River, as he may deem for the best interest of commerce. And all moneys now to the credit of different sections of the Arkansas River, other than appropriations for the operating of snag-boats, shall be available for use under this head; and in future the engineer in charge of this work and the Secretary of War shall make report upon the progress and needs of this work under this head, instead of reporting upon disconnected projects, as heretofore.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, to strike out the clause from line 1073 to line 1078, inclusive, as follows:

Improving Arkansas River, Arkansas: For removing obstructions, $25,000, of which $10,000 is authorized to be used in constructing a new hull for the snag-boat Wichita, including capstans and the transfer of the upper works, and $375 in completing survey and maps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1079, after the word "Arkansas," to insert "To complete improvement;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Red River, Arkansas: To complete improvement above Fulton, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1087, after the word "Arkansas," to strike out "Continuing" and insert "To complete;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Petit Jean River, Arkansas: To complete improvement below the iron bridge at the Rocky Crossing, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1092, after the word "Camden," to insert "To complete;" and in line 1093, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "nine;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Ouachita River, Arkansas, above Camden: To complete, $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1095, at the end of the clause appropriating $7,000 for "improving Cache River, Arkansas," to add the words:

Three thousand dollars of which shall be expended for the building and equipping of a small hand-propelled snag-boat, and $4,000 for running expenses of the same, in accordance with the recommendation of the engineer in charge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, to strike out lines 1132 and 1133, as follows:

Improving South Fork of Cumberland River, Kentucky: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1138, after the word "Kentucky," to strike out "continuing" and insert "to complete;" and in line 1139, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "six;" so as to read:

Improving Tradewater River, Kentucky: To complete improvement, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1144, after the word "river," to insert "also $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended for the construction of a drift-gap at Davis Island Dam, with the necessary bear-trap gates and masonry walls;" so as to read:

Improving the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, $380,000; of which sum $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended in removing the rock obstruction at the mouth of Licking River; also $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended for the construction of a drift-gap at Davis Island Dam, with the necessary bear-trap gates and masonry walls; also $7,500 in constructing an ice-pier pursuant to the present or prospective plan of the Chief of Engineers, at or near Portsmouth, Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of the same clause, after the word "harbor," in line 1179, to insert:

And $30,000 of said sum of $380,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, in repairing the dam at the head of Cumberland Island and building a dam from the head of Dog Island to the Illinois shore; and $30,000 of said sum of $380,000 may be expended in protecting the harbor at Cairo, Ill., in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. FRYE. I have received a letter from the engineer in charge, William E. Merrill, which letter has been submitted to the Committee on Commerce, and it makes it clear to them that this amendment ought not to be adopted, and I am instructed to ask the Senate to nonconcur in the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the letter read.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Vermont asks that the letter be read. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The letter will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE, CUSTOM-HOUSE,
Cincinnati, June 7, 1888.

SIR: I desire to call your attention to a few points in connection with the pending river and harbor bill.

Lines 1180-1188, Ohio River.

The reconstruction of the Cumberland dam is bitterly opposed by the commerce of the Ohio River. I rebuilt this dam once and removed it afterwards for reasons that you will see in the report of the Chief of Engineers for 1876, part 2, page 22.

The other item is for "protecting the harbor at Cairo." The harbor at Cairo, if this means the steam-boat landing, needs no protection. There is some wash of a piece of shore about a mile and a half above the steam-boat landing which belongs to private parties, and I was ordered a couple of months ago to examine and report on this shore, but I was unable to do so on account of high water. According to the general rule this matter should lie over until an engineer's report has been made. If every washing bank on the Ohio River is to be protected by the United States, the river and harbor bill will be swamped by projects that have no connection with navigation.

In this connection I would add that the Great Miami levee at Lawrenceburgh is for the protection of the town from inundation, as is also the levee at Shawneetown. Neither has the slightest connection with navigation. The levee at Lawrenceburgh is the track of the Cincinnati, St. Louis and Indianapolis Railroad, and I am now raising this track, or paying the company for raising it, out of an allotment made in the last river and harbor bill from the appropriation for improving the Ohio River.

I have no desire to oppose the will of Congress in the distribution of appropriations, but as Congress often acts on erroneous information and seems to desire that the United States engineers shall give them facts for their use in making appropriations, I have thought it my duty to call your attention to these points.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. E. MERRILL,
Lieutenant-Colonel Engineers.

Hon. W. P. FRYE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BECK. When this amendment came to my notice I looked at it somewhat, and after the committee's action on it, believing that the matter was left in the discretion of the Secretary of War to do it or not as he pleased, and if it was not considered proper after a thorough examination it would do no harm, I am a little astonished to find a letter from Colonel Merrill now giving his individual opinion in regard to what he thinks ought to be done and asking that the amendment be stricken out. I was not expecting a letter of this sort, and am not prepared for it. I thought the Secretary of War ought to have a right to do what is here proposed if he thought proper after examining the head of the Cumberland River. There was a voluminous statement showing the importance and the necessity of it, and the Committee on Commerce was satisfied in regard to it. It being a matter of discretion, I know of no reason why the amendment should not be made. Colonel Merrill is a very good officer in some regards. In others I am not prepared to vouch for him. I do not think the action of the committee ought to be overthrown by a letter like this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. BECK. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to repeat what I said a moment ago, that after a hearing before the Committee on Commerce the committee unanimously determined that the chairman should request the Senate to nonconcur in this amendment.

Mr. BECK. On what authority?

Mr. FRYE. On the letter which has been read and the report to which Colonel Merrill refers.

Mr. BECK. Colonel Merrill alone?

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to delay the Senate, as a call of the yeas and nays might embarrass the bill. I will offer the amendment again in the Senate, if on examination I find it proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the demand for the yeas and nays to be withdrawn.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair the noes have it, and the amendment is disagreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1201, after the word "Zanesville," to insert "and other necessary repairs to locks and dams on said river;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Muskingum River, Ohio: For the construction of a lock at Taylorsville and the reconstruction of the lock at Zanesville, and other necessary repairs to locks and dams on said river, pursuant to the report of the engineers, $102,000; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to grant leases or licenses for the use of the water-powers on the Muskingum River at such rate and on such conditions and for such periods of time as may seem to him just, equitable, and expedient: Provided, That the leases or licenses shall be limited to the use of the surplus water not required for navigation. And he is also empowered to grant leases or licenses for the occupation of such lands belonging to the United States on said Muskingum River as may be required for mill-sites or for other purposes not inconsistent with the requirements of navigation; and all moneys received under such leases or licenses shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States, and the itemized statement thereof shall accompany the annual report of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that amendment explained, Mr. President. Are there any other locks and dams on that river besides those of the United States?

Mr. FRYE. No; no locks and dams that do not belong to the United States. The United States had the misfortune, in my judgment, to purchase this improvement from the State of Ohio, but it was understood that there were very few repairs needed, and it was so stated on the floor of the Senate, I think. It turns out on examination that there is hardly anything of the whole improvement that does not require repairs, and these words "and other necessary repairs to locks and dams on said river" were put in because the committee believed from the statement of the engineers that other repairs were as absolutely necessary as the construction of this lock as provided for. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has a letter on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a letter from Colonel Merrill in which he speaks of the amendment proposed by the committee as not at all necessary. I therefore suggest that it be dropped out.

As a matter of course when work constructed many years ago by civil engineers under State authority was placed under the control of military engineers, men who are experts, as Colonel Merrill and others, they are not satisfied with the kind of work the State was satisfied with in the construction of internal improvements, and therefore they no doubt recommend a greater amount of improvements and a greater amount of repairs than would be deemed necessary by the authorities of any State. I understand that their mode of conducting improvements is on a different scale from that adopted by State authorities. Therefore it is that what might be considered very reasonable and right by a board of public works such as we have in Ohio would be considered very inefficient by a board of engineers of the United States Army. When a work is done under the charge of military engineers of the United States, they expect good work at a good cost. You can not have one without the other. I think, therefore, the amendment had better be omitted so as to avoid any ambiguity, and apply this sum to the particular works recommended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I notice from the remarks of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce respecting this Muskingum River in Ohio that it was a very great mistake, in his opinion, on the part of Congress to take that, as I believe, worthless river for any purpose of navigation, and the worthless works that the State of Ohio had built there by the aid, I believe, of land grants of the United States——

Mr. SHERMAN. Not a dollar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The United States took those works off the hands of the State of Ohio, and paid her a large sum of money for them.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I correct the Senator in regard to that matter? It was before the era of land grants at all. The work was constructed in 1837, and there was no land grant, nor did the Government of the United States ever contribute a cent to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Ohio, who certainly ought to be more familiar with the land grants to that State than I am, says I am mistaken in saying that there was a land grant applicable to this particular stream. I hope I am mistaken, though I very much doubt it, although the stream probably was not named in the land grant with precision; for the river, according to my examination when the matter was upon the subject of our taking the works off the hands of the State, was not one that the interests of national commerce or State commerce required should be made navigable in the present stage of the world.

Now, recurring to the remarks of my friend from Maine, I opposed and tried to get the Senate to refuse to take this thing off the hands of the State of Ohio; but of course (as is usual in all such cases) without any considerable success; that is to say, a majority of the Senate thought that the national interests required that it should be taken. I have forgotten how many thousand or hundred thousand dollars were paid to the State of Ohio for it.

I find that this bill illustrates what sort of an elephant we have on our hands. The Secretary of War is to grant leases and licenses for the use of the water-power on such terms as he considers just and expedient; but they are not to hinder navigation. He is to grant leases or licenses for the occupation of lands belonging to the United States on the Muskingum River, that is those we got from the State of Ohio, for mill-sites and other purposes. We took out from the hands of the State of Ohio a failing, costly, losing, worthless enterprise that she waited to get rid of, because if she kept it up at all it was a tax upon her treasury, and naturally enough—and I do not blame the State of Ohio for it, for it was done openly—if she could persuade the representatives of all the other States to take it off her hands and tax the whole people of the United States for keeping it up, for whatever use it might be, it was a good thing for the State of Ohio that we did it.

Now we have got a lot of useless and worthless property which we are to lease out and peddle out by licenses and leases for mill and whatever other sites there may be to whatever customer we can find.

This illustrates my own course in particular and enables me—because this amendment is of no particular account—to explain why I have given up as one Senator following this bill in detail, after the test on a small appropriation for a river in North Carolina which had no business to be improved—I have given up the idea of persuading a majority of the Senate (who undoubtedly are wiser and more patriotic than I am) that anything can be proposed on a bill of this kind and supported earnestly by a Senator from the locality where it is, which can be rejected; and my respect for the Senate is such that I do not wish to fight against "manifest destiny" and the judgment of a majority of my fellows. And so I keep silent in respect of these matters in the main, not because there are not a great many similar improvident and unjust expenditures provided for in this bill, as there have been in all its predecessors, but, as I say, it is useless and perhaps unjust for any one Senator to undertake to resist the judgment of a majority of the Senate in respect of this long enumeration which contains so large a per cent. of things that ought not to be done.

The appropriation of liberal sums of money, all that is necessary, for the improvement of the navigation of rivers in which the people of the States at large or of the States in their localities have a just commercial interest, and which in the sense of the Constitution belong to the commerce of the United States, as rivers that are in their nature navigable and only require to be improved—not rivers that have to be made—I have not the slightest objection to, but I am for. But when a bill of this kind is interlarded in so many instances with mere local pride, with selfish considerations or neighborhood convenience, where the people of the States concerned, if they wanted the improvement proposed, ought to tax themselves for it, as a matter of mere local concern, it makes it difficult for me to vote for a whole bill of this kind when it is completed.

I have said this once for all, Mr. President.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont does not apprehend, I imagine, the reasons why the State of Ohio surrendered this improvement and why the Government of the United States finally assumed it. They are these: At the time the Muskingum River improvement was made it was a navigable stream, and a series of locks and dams were built to make very good slack-water navigation. That was in 1836-'37. At that time the Government of the United States refused to make any works of internal improvement whatever, and they were attended to by the States. Most of the States, North and South, assumed to construct their own works of internal improvement. Ohio, among other things, constructed the Ohio Canal, the Miami Canal, and the Muskingum River improvement. The State became embarrassed so that in 1841 or 1842 Ohio bonds sold at one time at 50 cents on the dollar, and the State even failed to pay the interest for a time. Nearly all the systems of public works then conducted by the States fell to the ground, and some of the Southern States were thereby so embarrassed in their financial affairs that they have never yet recovered.

The Government of the United States subsequently, under the lead of both political parties, adopted the idea that works of internal improvement should be made on navigable streams, and to improve harbors of a national character. Under that system the river just opposite the mouth of the Muskingum, which comes into the Ohio at Marietta, was constantly improved and excellently improved by the Government of the United States by locks and dams of similar character to those in the Muskingum. The Tennessee River, the Cumberland River, and many other branches of the Ohio and Mississippi have been thus improved by the Government of the United States.

Under these circumstances, the State of Ohio having only this single work of internal improvement by locks and dams, it fell rather into decay. It was kept up and always paid expenses, but that was about all. Meanwhile the State of Ohio, seeing that it had this improvement on its hands while all its sister States about it had their rivers improved by the General Government, rivers of the same character and degree, felt it but right to turn this improvement over to the General Government.

The Senator says he does not know how much the Government paid for it. It never paid a cent. There was simply a surrender of the improvement as it stood, in a somewhat dilapidated state, it is true, but its precise condition was known and reported by the official papers. Ohio proposed to surrender the improvement by an act of the State Legislature to the General Government. The General Government finally agreed to accept it, and it was recommended by the Secretary of War, and also by the officers of the Engineer Corps, and it was finally adopted by Congress.

Mr. TELLER. When was that done?

Mr. SHERMAN. Two years ago, I think. That is all there is about it. It is true that when this work was taken possession of by the General Government it was said some of the locks were insufficient, some were not wide enough, in some cases the scales were out of order and had to be rebuilt. I have no doubt that under the management of Ohio they would have been continued without rebuilding; but now Colonel Merrill recommends that one of the locks be rebuilt and the other largely repaired. I think if we had the management of it in Ohio we would not do anything of the kind, but would bear it and get along; but the Engineer Corps, having charge of it, naturally want good work instead of poor work.

Here is an appropriation of $102,000 to fix the locks. Suppose it should cost $200,000 to give the people of that beautiful valley, where they are now celebrating their one hundred years of national birth, a complete improvement of this river, is there any injustice in that when the very rivers all around and about, the Wabash and the Illinois and the Kanawha and the Kentucky and the Tennessee and every river in every State all around, are being improved by the National Government? Is it unreasonable that the Government should assume the management and care of this improvement, which cost the people of the State of Ohio $2,000,000?

I do not think there is any ground of complaint on the part of the Senator from Vermont as to the particular amendment in view. I think myself that amendment ought to be disagreed to, because, as the engineers recommend the improvement of these two locks alone, leaving the general repairs to be managed as heretofore out of a general fund for that purpose, I think it is better to take their report just as they had it.

I am told that one of my colleagues in the other House, probably on representations made to the committee, had this amendment put on. If that is so, I am perfectly willing to let it remain on and let the matter go to a conference, or let it be stricken off, whichever is deemed proper.

Mr. VEST. That is the fact.

Mr. SHERMAN. He thinks there is no provision made for repairs. There is, however, provision made for repairs generally. Colonel Merrill in a letter which I handed to the Senator from Maine, and it is on his desk, I suppose, says expressly that it is necessary to have the amendment made for that purpose, and he thought it had better be made.

Mr. VEST. The amendment can not do any harm.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say I have no objection to its being on or off, as the Senate please.

Mr. VEST. I want to say a word in regard to this item in the river and harbor bill.

No one in the Senate has any right to complain of this appropriation after the action of the Senate two years ago. We proposed then if the State of Ohio would transfer her improvement of the Muskingum River to the Government of the United States to keep it in repair. The House bill came to us with that provision in it, and the Committee on Commerce of the Senate reported against it, and the Senator from Ohio moved to disagree to the action of the committee of the Senate, and succeeded by one vote in reversing our action. The whole matter was debated here, and if I am not mistaken the Senator from Vermont voted with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not much. I resisted it all in my power.

Mr. VEST. I beg the Senator's pardon. I know that the committee was beaten by one majority. I objected to it in committee and in the Senate. I did not think the great State of Ohio ought to place this improvement on the General Government after it had allowed this work to go into a condition of ruin for want of repairs; but it was done by the Senate and this is the logical result, and no man has a right to complain of it. I told the Senate then, and other Senators told the Senate, what would be the result; that the next thing the State of Ohio would come here, or rather, the Engineer Bureau in charge of the work, would come and say, "We require now several hundred thousand dollars to put this work in a fit condition;" and it has come to pass.

Then the State of Kentucky, that does not owe a dollar in the world, whose credit is as good as that of any other State or the United States, put one of her internal improvements on the General Government, and now I understand there is a proposition to take the Licking River and the Green River improvements. I have objected to the whole thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Licking is not here.

Mr. VEST. But Green River is in the bill. After the Senate determined deliberately that they would take this work off the hands of the State of Ohio they can make no discrimination against any other State. I was opposed to the system; I am opposed to it now. I fought it from 1877, but was beaten in the Senate; and I simply rise now to say that we are plucking the fruit from the tree we planted two years ago.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I have not examined the report of the engineers on this matter, for it is not before me. There seems to be an instruction in the report of the committee on the provisions of the bill. The report of the committee is in favor of an appropriation of $60,000 "for ice harbor at the mouth of the Muskingum River, Ohio," for the completion of that work. The provision is—

Improving Muskingum River, Ohio: For the construction of a lock at Taylorsville and the reconstruction of a lock at Zanesville, and other necessary repairs to locks and dams on said river, pursuant to the report of the engineers, $102,000.

I suppose this is questionable, of course, but it is not apparent on looking at the report of the committee and the provisions of the bill. I suppose some member of the committee will tell us why the report is one thing and the provision of the bill another. But that is not the main question to which I rise now.

Mr. COKE. Perhaps my colleague will allow me to call his attention to page 147 of the report of the committee, where this item appears:

Muskingum River.—Improving Muskingum River, Ohio: For the construction of a lock at Taylorsville and the reconstruction of the lock at Zanesville, and other necessary repairs to locks and dams on said river, pursuant to the report of the engineers, $102,000.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will find that there are two items. He has referred to the report relating to one while he is looking at the provision of the bill in regard to the other.

Mr. REAGAN. I saw it in the report in the first place, but the index does not indicate a reference to the report to which my attention is now called.

But, Mr. President, if we intend to pursue the policy of improving the navigable waters of the United States, it seems to me that it is essential for the present that until we can improve the open navigation of the country we should not be expending the public revenues on very costly works on small and unimportant streams.

The canal at Des Moines Rapids was one connecting the waters of the Upper and Lower Mississippi, connecting the open water way of a great stream. The canal at the Mussel Shoals, on the Tennessee River, was of a like character. So the locks and dams at Sault Ste. Marie connected the lakes, connected great bodies of navigable water where there were large amounts of commerce. There could be no objection to works of that kind, because of the great amount of commerce which they facilitated and aided.

But if we go on making slack-water navigation on the small and unimportant streams of the country, our river and harbor improvement system must break down, for the revenues of the country will not permit of providing slack-water navigation on all the unimportant streams of the United States. When I say "unimportant" I do not mean those without commerce and wholly unimportant, but I mean those comparatively unimportant, because they are small streams and because of the large amounts of money required to improve them.

I have resisted from year to year for twelve or more years the effort to take local streams and expend large sums of money in building slack-water navigation upon them, and I have done it because I am a friend to the river and harbor bill, and a friend to the improvement of the water navigation of the country as one of the great aids of commerce, and to the development of the wealth and resources of the country.

We had as well consider the point. I do not know but that we have gone too fast and too far, and that the work of improving the water ways of the country is to be wrecked upon this idea of improving small streams at very great expense. We commenced on the Kanawha River and improved that for 96 miles at an expense of some $4,000,000, I think. We have got the Kentucky River on our hands, and we have got a number of other rivers on our hands, and we are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to improve streams with small commerce. I do not mean to say that the Kanawha River is a stream with very small commerce, because its peculiar situation gives it a very considerable commerce. But going over the list we find that we are providing for slack-water navigation at great cost to the Government on streams that have but little commerce. We are expending money on streams and communities the expenditures on which may benefit the localities and the people residing about them much more than they benefit the general commerce of the country.

I recognize the right of Congress, the power and the duty of Congress to improve the navigable waters of the country that are under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government; that is, those streams on which commerce is borne that goes by continuous navigation by water to other States and to foreign countries, but I do not recognize the right of Congress to make merely local improvements.

I am not so much disposed now to discuss the question of power as to discuss the question of the policy of breaking down the river and harbor bill by putting upon it slack-water navigation, taking money away from improving the great water ways of the country, the open navigation of the country, in order to make local improvements by slack-water navigation. Senators might as well understand that if we go on with slack-water navigation the country will call a halt, and it will be the defeat of river and harbor bills for the improvement of the open navigation of the country.

I simply rose to renew here the protest I have made from year to year for twelve or fourteen years against slack-water navigation and local improvements merely at the expense of the great system of the improvement of the water ways of the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce in lines 1201 and 1202.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent to return to page 9, line 196. The last word there "1881" should be "1871," as appears from a letter in my possession from the chairman of the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The bill adopts the later plan of improvement, which it was not the intention to adopt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent to return to line 196, on page 9, and proposes the amendment which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, line 196, before the word "one," it is proposed to strike out "eighty" and insert "seventy;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at New Rochelle, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, the balance remaining on hand from former appropriations to be expended in pursuance of the project adopted in 1871.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Saving objection, I ask the Senator to explain how much is "the balance remaining on hand from former appropriations" which is here authorized "to be expended."

Mr. DOLPH. I suppose it is $3,000. There are two surveys, one of 1871 and one of 1881. It was not the intention of the committee to adopt the latter and more expensive one, but to compel the application of the money to the former one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The phraseology is such as to cover every unexpended balance of any former appropriation made at any time, and it would be interesting to know how much, taking all of those for twenty years past, they would all foot up. It is not confined to the balance remaining under the last appropriation bill, but the balance of all former appropriations.

Mr. DOLPH. But the final balance of all previous appropriations is shown by the manner in which these accounts are made up by local engineers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do not river and harbor appropriations ever lapse?

Mr. DOLPH. They do not lapse. They are continuing appropriations. Therefore the balance in the report this year is the balance of all time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to considering this amendment? If there be none, the question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and continued to the end of the following clause, from line 1219 to line 1221 of section 1:

But nothing in this act shall be construed to affect any vested right, if such there be, of any lessee of water-power on said river.

Mr. REAGAN. I had looked at the clause, but had not at first noticed the fact that we are undertaking to make water-power and peddle it out to private parties in the name of improving the navigable waters of this country. We propose to create water-power by the Federal Government and peddle it out to those who may need it for private purposes. Surely the Senate will not go into such a measure as that.

Not only is this a local improvement, but we abandon the idea that it is purely for the purpose of accommodating the commerce of the country and make the Government a corporation to provide and peddle out water-power for private millers and manufacturers! I trust the Senate will vote this clause out. Surely we do not mean to go on with this. I have on a former occasion referred to a case where the Government paid about $2,000,000 to make water-power for private purposes, and I hope we shall stop now.

Mr. DOLPH. The United States are not proposing to create any water-power. The State of Ohio by the improvement of the Muskingum River did create water-power which is incidental to navigation. When that was turned over by the State the river with its improvements was turned over. There is a water-power which now belongs to the United States, and ought to be utilized. There is no improvement being made for the purpose of creating water-power, but the water-power was created by the State in the improvement of the river, and this simply authorizes the Secretary of War to do what was previously done by the State of Ohio.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand that; but this clause provides an appropriation for the improvement of the Muskingum River. It appropriates money for that purpose. It creates water-power by that appropriation, and then the Secretary of War, if I can understand it, is authorized to peddle out that water-power to private parties.

Mr. VEST. But we do not create the water-power. It is there and must be used by somebody. I submit to my friend from Texas that if we do not do this, what are we to do? The State of Ohio has been leasing out this water power. We have obtained the whole system from beginning to end. We have not created it. We found it there, and having got it, I want to save what we can out of it.

Mr. REAGAN. I confess I am surprised that the Senator from Missouri should undertake to defend a measure like this. What power have we to peddle out water? We claim the power and we have the power to improve the navigable water ways of the United States in order to benefit commerce, but where we derive the power here asserted, whether by the direct assertion of the fact or as trustee of the State of Ohio, to peddle water for private purposes, I do not know, and I think any gentleman will find it very difficult to derive that power from the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. VEST. Where do you find the power in Congress to dispose of any public property?

Mr. REAGAN. That is incident to the control of the property that the Constitution authorizes the Government to acquire. There are kinds of property that we have the right to acquire, public buildings, etc., and when we have that property which we have a lawful right to acquire, and find that we have no further use for it, we may dispose of it as a matter of necessity. Indeed, in that case it is a necessity that it shall be disposed of for the public good. But that is a very different question from the one of creating property for the purpose of peddling it out to private parties.

Mr. VEST. We did not create this water-power; we found it.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand there were locks and dams there erected by the State of Ohio at an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and when the work was turned over to the General Government the water-power went to the Federal Government. The property was taken on the idea of providing slack-water navigation to benefit the commerce that passes over the Muskingum River, and now we are asked to sanction a proposition to grant leases and licenses of the water-power on that river. I protest, sir, that it has no constitutional warrant, that it is wrong in principle, that it is an assumption of power that in the better days of this Republic no one would have dreamed of assuming.

Mr. DOLPH. This item has been passed by the Senate and the Senate has proceeded to consider another item of appropriation. If it were not for suggestions made in regard to this improvement which I think ought to be answered, I would not say a word.

I consider the Muskingum River quite as important to navigation as many of the other rivers the improvement of which has been provided for by Congress and which are provided for in this bill. I consider it quite as important as some of the appropriations for the works which are appropriated for in the Senator's own State. I find by reference to the report that—

The Muskingum flows through a rich valley, furnishing a large amount of commerce. Along and accessible to the river are important deposits of coal, salt, natural gas, oil, and cement. The total extent accessible for mining is about 60 miles in length, with an average width of 5 miles on each side of the river. With improved navigation a large increase of business would undoubtedly be developed.

Here is a river 60 miles in length going into the Ohio and tributary to the Mississippi River, and the commerce of which is tributary to the great bulk of commerce that flows through the Mississippi River. The presumption is in favor of the importance of the improvement, because the State of Ohio undertook out of the State treasury to make the improvement at a time when, as has been stated, the United States was not making appropriations for such improvements, and that State expended a large amount of money on it. Having done that, and the General Government having improved other rivers of a similar character throughout the country, the State of Ohio turned over the Muskingum to the United States without payment for what had been expended by the State.

It is true that there are some locks upon the river, but similar improvements are made on other rivers where there are rapids or other obstructions to navigation which require locks to make the navigation continuous. The United States found these locks with a surplus of water, and that is all there is of the case. The improvement was made for the purpose of improving navigation. The locks were constructed for that purpose. We found the navigation improved, the locks there, the surplus water there, which must either run to waste or be appropriated by some individuals, as is suggested by the Senator from Missouri, without payment. The United States simply uses this property, which now is its own by virtue of the act of Congress and the act of the Ohio Legislature, as it uses any other public property.

I can not see that there is any constitutional question involved, nor can I see that the suggestions of the Senator from Texas concerning the character of this improvement are really supported by the facts of the case.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives concurring in some and non-concurring in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the amendments that the House disagreed to read, so that we may know what they are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments to which the House disagreed to will be read.

The Chief Clerk read from the message of the House of Representatives as follows:

The House of Representatives non-concur in the amendments of the Senate: No. 1, page 1, line 12, strike out all after "and," where it occurs the first time, down to and including "eighty," line 13, and insert "$22,027.30."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator please explain what that means?

Mr. ALLISON. Is there a copy of the printed bill at the desk?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw the request. It is impossible to understand what all these numbers mean.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator withdraw his request?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw my request to have the amendments read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MARTHA F. WOODRUM.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2805) granting a pension to Martha F. Woodrum, widow of James Woodrum, deceased, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to the same.

C. K. DAVIS,
JOHN H. MITCHELL,
D. TURPIE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
THOS. L. THOMPSON,
J. LOGAN CHIPMAN,
W. GODFREY HUNTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not see that any action is required by the Senate on this conference report. It will be placed on file.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRYE. One word of explanation as to the Muskingum River leases. I have a letter from Colonel Merrill, the engineer in charge, in which he says:

The Secretary of War doubts his authority to grant leases of water-power on the Muskingum River, notwithstanding the fact that such leases were always granted by the State of Ohio, and that when the United States took charge of the river it was generally understood that no change would be made in the time-honored policy of permitting the surplus water to be used for manufacturing purposes.

It therefore seems necessary that Congress should distinctly authorize the Secretary of War to grant leases for water-power and the necessary land for mill sites; and to this effect I would suggest that the following clause be added to the river and harbor bill now pending:

And that is the clause which was added.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1236, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "a" and insert "all or any;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving St. Clair Flats Ship-Canal, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $75,000; all or any portion of which may, in the discretion of the engineer, be expended in dredging Grosse Pointe Channel.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to give notice that when the bill comes into the Senate I shall ask a vote of the Senate—I do not care to call for a division now, as we may not have a quorum—on the clause from line 1199 to line 1218, inclusive, relative to leases, etc., on the Muskingum River.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now being read for the consideration of amendments proposed by the Committee on Commerce. It will be in order, after those amendments have been acted on, to move to further amend the bill in Committee of the Whole.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and continued to the clause on line 1239 to line 1241, as follows:

Improving St. Mary's River, at the Falls, Michigan: Continuing improvement on new lock, dam, and approaches, $1,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like a little explanation of that item in connection with the item at the top of the same page. This appropriates a million dollars for "improving St. Mary's River, at the Falls, Michigan." In lines 1224 to 1229, inclusive, is this paragraph:

Improving Hay Lake Channel, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $500,000: Provided, That any portion or all of this sum may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be used in the work at the falls of the St. Mary's River, in addition to the specific appropriations herein made for the latter.

I see in looking at the engineer's report that the Hay Lake Channel, as it is called, was an invention of the former river and harbor bill for building a new line there to shorten the distance and get out of the St. Mary's River proper, and to thus improve the commercial facilities there, and a great deal of money has been appropriated and expended for that purpose. Now, it would appear from this bill as it came from the House that it has not been thought important to appropriate any money definitely and positively to go on with the Hay Lake Channel business, which apparently is to be thrown up if the Secretary of War chooses to take all the money, leaving none for Hay Lake Channel, and apply it at the Falls, which is entirely a different work. I should like to have an explanation about that; whether it has been found that Hay Lake Channel is so unimportant or so impracticable in the way of building a ship route that way that we are going to gradually edge out of that business by this double appropriation for St. Mary's Falls; or what it does mean?

Mr. SAWYER. I do not think that the engineers have abandoned the Hay Lake Channel by any means, because it is very important, but the canal at the end of Lake Superior is locked by some of the best locks in the world probably, and they are not sufficient to do the business of the outlet of Lake Superior. The object is to allow the engineers, if they do not need the money for Hay Lake Channel, to go on and get out the stone and get ready for the new lock at the Falls. That lock will cost four or five million dollars. It would be a great deal cheaper to the Government to make the whole appropriation for that lock at once.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that. I am not criticising or condemning whatever is thought necessary and the doing of it as fast as it can possibly be done, to enlarge the locks at St. Mary's Falls. That is one thing; but here I find that in former appropriation bills we have gone into a project, as this bill is so fond of calling it, of making the Hay Lake Channel, which is an entirely different thing, which is said to shorten the distance 11 miles and be a great thing when it is done, and we have made appropriations and money has been expended ad libitum, and, as I see by the report, they are substantially out of money now at the Hay Lake Channel. This bill appears to give the Hay Lake Channel the go-by entirely by allowing the Secretary of War to stop entirely on that channel and to devote that $500,000 to the locks. Why not, if a million and a half is needed to go on with the locks this year, give it in this item and either leave out Hay Lake Channel entirely as a useful performance any more, as one which has been found to be impracticable, or appropriate the money which the report of the engineers seems to show ought to be appropriated to carry it on? Why is Hay Lake Channel made the scapegoat to carry $500,000 to St. Mary's Falls—it never yet carried anything else to be sure—and left dry and desolate without any appropriation?

Mr. SAWYER. I think the Senator is mistaken about Hay Lake Channel not demanding money or not being of importance, because the other channel is a very crooked one. It may save more than 11 miles. The lock is of main importance, and that ought to go on. If they do not want to use all of the appropriation for Hay Lake Channel, they can use part of it to get stone out for the new lock. I think myself it is as well to have that provision in.

Mr. DOLPH. This is a very important improvement. I am told that the commerce passing through this lock at St. Mary's River is very large.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It certainly is.

Mr. DOLPH. It is larger than the commerce of the Suez Canal and larger than the foreign commerce of the city of New York.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is undoubtedly very large.

Mr. DOLPH. In 1886 Congress determined that the capacity of the present locks was not sufficient to accommodate the commerce, or will not be long before another lock can be completed. Besides that, if anything should happen to the present lock so that it could not be operated for a time the whole commerce would be obstructed at this point. The engineer says in regard to the necessary appropriation for the lock:

The aggregate, then, of the funds which should be made available as soon as practicable is $2,235,875. Whilst any reduction of this amount would be a cause of great regret, yet, if it should be deemed necessary to make a reduction, the best way to do so would be to omit the $1,225,000 for masonry of lock-walls. On no account should the remainder ($1,010,875) be reduced, nor should the appropriation in that case be trammeled with any condition requiring more than the excavation of the lock-pit and building the culverts and lock-floor.

I understand the dredging of the Hay Lake Channel, which is to shorten the distance and straighten the channel and make it navigable at night, is really a part of this general improvement, but as dredging can be made from year to year, and if not done this year possibly can be done next year before the completion of this lock, and as the local engineer and the Chief of Engineers—because the committee had several communications on this subject from the Engineer Department—recommend this appropriation as it is made, it was thought advisable that there should be some fund appropriated by which in case of accident repairs could be made at this lock by which cut stone could be provided for proceeding with the work another year. The other House sent it to us in this shape, an appropriation for the improvement of Hay Lake Channel, dredging in Hay Lake Channel, and providing that any part of the amount might be used, if found necessary in the judgment of the Chief of Engineers, upon this lock or cutting stone for the new lock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the Senator to say that there is a letter from the engineer or engineers recommending that this appropriation for the Hay Lake Channel be applicable to the St. Mary's Canal. I should like to hear that letter, so as to understand the ground on which the engineer puts it. Perhaps he will tell us something about the Hay Lake affair.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that this item be passed over, and we can return to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is in the text of the bill, so that the reading can go on.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, after the word "Montello," at the end of line 1261, to insert "except as hereinafter provided;" and in line 1263, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Of this sum $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used for deepening the south outlet of Lake Winnebago, at Neenah, Wis., so as to make navigation practicable during low-water season; $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended in constructing a levee at Portage, Wis., to prevent the overflow of the Wisconsin River into the Upper Fox River.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving Fox River, Wisconsin, below Montello, except as hereinafter provided: Continuing improvement, $100,000; of this sum $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used for deepening the south outlet of Lake Winnebago, at Neenah, Wis., so as to make navigation practicable during low-water season; $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended in constructing a levee at Portage, Wis., to prevent the overflow of the Wisconsin River into the Upper Fox River.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear explained this matter of overflow. We have had some items in a previous part of the bill where the river seemed to be destitute of water. Here we have a case where apparently the river has too much water and we are going to keep it from overflowing. I should like to understand what that really is, for information.

Mr. SAWYER. Does the Senator wish me to explain it now?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. SAWYER. The Wisconsin River rises very high. The Government has improved directly opposite the portage, where there are some islands, and blocked up the other side of the islands years ago to make the river navigable. If it was not for that I suppose the river would still be liable to overflow. The ground is low there for 2 miles. They had to get out one hundred men there last spring in the time of high water. If the river overflows there, it overflows the whole country. The Wisconsin River is a very large and powerful stream. This appropriation is intended to prevent it from destroying the works below.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How far on the river is that?

Mr. SAWYER. About 2 miles, and the Fox River is some 8 feet below the Wisconsin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the United States are to prevent the Wisconsin River from flowing across these 2 miles of flat country, I suppose?

Mr. SAWYER. Yes; it is a low country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Going across from there to the other river?

Mr. SAWYER. It flowed on the other side of the islands. You have blocked up the other side of the islands, turning in a heavy volume of water on this bank. I think it is no more than just that we should prevent the consequences of that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see anything in the report of the engineers—very likely I have overlooked it—on the subject of improving this river by preventing it, when there is a flood, from running over these 2 miles of the beautiful lowlands of Wisconsin.

Mr. SAWYER. We have a report on the subject, but it is not here now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should very much like to have that report read.

Mr. SAWYER. I will look it up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not in the official reports submitted to Congress by the Secretary of War, so far as I find, and there is no allusion to it. However, as I said, it is, of course, useless to attempt to resist any of these amendments, but I have felt it my duty to call attention to them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, after line 1271, to insert:

The sum of $6,000, appropriated by the river and harbor act of August 5, 1886, for a levee at Portage, Wis., shall be available for that purpose; the sum of $10,000, appropriated by the river and harbor act of July 5, 1884, "to be used in maintaining a channel between De Pere and Green Bay, Wis." shall be used, as soon as practicable, on the Lower Fox River, in buoying, straightening, and deepening the channel of said river, between said cities, to a depth of not less than 12 feet at low-water mark, the measurement for such depth to be based upon the lowest recorded stages of water heretofore found by United States governmental surveys to have existed in Lake Michigan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he will kindly tell us what has become of the channel between De Pere and Green Bay, Wis., from which we are to take this money which was appropriated four years ago and put it down on to the Lower Fox River?

Mr. SAWYER. No, we do not take that. We only make it available for this purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The way it reads is:

The sum of $10,000, appropriated by the river and harbor act of July 5, 1884, "to be used in maintaining a channel between De Pere and Green Bay, Wis.," shall be used, as soon as practicable, on the Lower Fox River.

Mr. SAWYER. That is the same thing exactly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the use of the reappropriation?

Mr. SAWYER. Because the other appropriation provided that it should be used to maintain a channel of 12 feet. The engineer said there was a channel of 12 feet during a certain period of the year, and consequently it could not be used. This is to have it used in boring.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They found that the appropriation for maintaining the channel was unnecessary, then, as I understand.

Mr. SAWYER. Before they were to use it to maintain a channel of 12 feet, and they construed it to mean 12 feet at high water. Now we want a channel of 12 feet at low water.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that recommended by the engineers?

Mr. SAWYER. I do not think it is in this report, but the local engineer has stated that he would like to put it in that shape.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have his letter read.

Mr. SAWYER. I have not got it here now, but I can get it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1286, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "ten;" and after "thousand" to strike out "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving St. Croix River, Wisconsin and Minnesota: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1298, after the word "Vincennes," to strike out "Continuing improvement, including the work at or near Grayville, $60,000" and insert "Continuing the work on lock and dam at Grand Rapids, near Mount Carmel Ill., $50,000, and for continuing improvements, including the work at or near Grayville, $10,000;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Wabash River, Indiana and Illinois, below Vincennes: Continuing the work on lock and dam at Grand Rapids, near Mount Carmel, Ill., $50,000; and for continuing improvements, including the work at or near Grayville, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1311, before the word "one-half," to insert "two and;" and after "one-half," to strike out "mile" and insert "miles;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Calumet River, Illinois and Indiana: Continuing improvement, $50,000, of which $15,000 is to be used in improving the river above the Forks to 2½ miles east of Hammond, and $35,000 for the improvement of the river between its mouth and One hundred and eighth street.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1322, at the end of the clause appropriating $200,000 for "Improving Illinois River, Illinois: Continuing improvement," to add:

And for the purpose of securing a continuous navigable water way between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River, having capacity and facilities adequate for the passage of the largest Mississippi River steam-boats, and of naval vessels suitable for defense in time of war, the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to cause to be made the proper surveys, plans, and estimates for a channel improvement and locks and dams in the beds of the Illinois and Desplaines Rivers from La Salle to Lockport, so as to provide a navigable water way, not less than 160 feet wide and not less than 14 feet deep, and to have surveyed and located a channel from Lockport to Lake Michigan, at or near the city of Chicago, such channel to be suitable for the purposes aforesaid, and capable of carrying not less than 600,000 cubic feet of water per minute, flowing at the rate of 2 miles per hour; the necessary expenses of such surveys, estimates, plans, and location to be paid out of the sum herein appropriated for the improvement of the Illinois River.

Mr. SHERMAN. That amendment ought to be considered in connection with the next paragraph. It is a part of the same thing.

Mr. FRYE. It is hardly a part of the same thing. The people who are in favor of this project are antagonistic somewhat to the other provision. There was a hearing before the committee touching this question. They do not embrace in their scheme at all what is known as the Hennepin scheme.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that in the absence of the Senators from Illinois this amendment ought not to be considered. It involves the great question of the making of a canal from Lake Michigan to the head waters of the Illinois River. We ought to understand before entering upon that work the magnitude of it. I think myself the matter had better go over until the Senators from Illinois are here. I am disposed to be opposed to this proposition, but I do not like to oppose it in the absence of those Senators.

Mr. FRYE. I am entirely willing to pass over these two items until to-morrow; but I should not wish the river and harbor bill to go into next week in order to await the return of the Senators from Illinois, and I should hardly consent to any postponement if I was not also myself opposed to both items. The two items may be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendments between lines 1322 and 1357 will be passed over informally until the remainder of the amendments of the Committee on Commerce have been acted upon.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1381, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

For operating snag-boats and dredge-boats on Upper Mississippi River, $15,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I trust that amendment of the committee will not be concurred in, and that the original amount as proposed by the House may be restored. The report of the engineers on this subject, on page 1617, states:

By the act of August 5, 1886, $22,500 was appropriated for this special work.

* * * * * * *

It appears to be generally admitted that the preservation of the navigation of the Upper Mississippi is a necessity in the interest of cheap freight rates and for the benefit of the general public; and, in considering the importance of such work and the amount of good resulting therefrom, it seems proper to consider all freight affected by river competition rather than the amount of freight actually carried on the river.

It is also stated that the amount of miscellaneous freight moved by boats during the year 1886 was 337,713 tons. The report also states:

The work of the snag and dredge boats is an important one, furnishing immediate results and benefiting especially present interests of navigation.

"I believe that permanent provision should be made for this work of snagging, wrecking, tree cutting and pulling, clearing banks, finding and marking new channels, making surveys, soundings, and examinations; assisting boats in distress, watching and repairing existing improvements, investigating and supervising work on bridges, collecting physical data and statistics of commerce and navigation, and, in general, facilitating and reducing expenses of navigation."

To carry on this work properly, including the operation of a dredge, would cost approximately $30,000 per year.

That I take to be the recommendation of the Board of Engineers upon the subject. The House of Representatives proposed to give $25,000 for that purpose. The Senate committee purposes to give but $15,000. I am not advised upon what ground, except a very general one, the reduction has been attempted. The work is of exceeding importance, covering the whole reach of river, I think, from Des Moines Rapids to St. Paul.

Mr. FRYE. My recollection is that there was an appropriation of a less sum than that made about three years ago, and that it was not all used. The Government owns the snag-boats there, and there was a balance left; and there is to-day a balance left of a former appropriation. It was found by the committee on investigating the matter that $15,000 is all that will be required for the use of snag-boats on that reach.

Mr. DAVIS. I have here the letter of the Secretary of War and the table. I shall be very much surprised if the Senator is correct in his recollection.

Mr. FRYE. I must be correct in the recollection.

Mr. DAVIS. See if you can find any excess of appropriation stated in this report. I do not think there is any.

Mr. FRYE. There was a balance left on every appropriation for the Upper Mississippi last year.

Mr. DAVIS. I have it here. On the 1st of July, 1887, the amount available from the appropriation of August 5, 1886, was $4,588.

Mr. FRYE. The other appropriation went over two years, and it was a smaller appropriation than $25,000 considerably. The committee found that $15,000 would do everything that was required.

Mr. DAVIS. I can not deduce that from the official figures before us. The balance available is $4,588. The Board of Engineers recommends $30,000 for this work. The House of Representatives proposed to give $25,000, manifestly carrying the $4,588 to the credit of the fund and taking it into allowance. The Senate committee now proposes to reduce it to $15,000.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator must remember that the bill does not pretend to appropriate anywhere near the sum which the engineers report. We could not do it. It would make a bill of $50,000,000. Unless in exceptional cases we have appropriated only half the amount which the engineers report could be properly expended this year. The engineers recommend that $30,000 be expended on this reach. One-half of that is proposed to be appropriated by the committee, and there is a balance of $4,000 and more left over from the last appropriation.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand perfectly well that it is not proposed to appropriate all that the Board of Engineers recommend, but if by the act of August 5, 1886, $22,500 was appropriated, and only $4,000 was left, I can not see why the amount given by the House should be reduced.

Mr. FRYE. That appropriation lasted over two years.

Mr. DAVIS. This appropriation is to run two years, is it not?

Mr. FRYE. That appropriation has lasted to the present time, nearly three years.

Mr. DAVIS. Is not this appropriation to run two years?

Mr. FRYE. Undoubtedly; but that appropriation of $22,500 has run nearly three years, with $4,000 left over.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems to me that this proposed reduction is entirely arbitrary. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 187) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BOUTELLE, Mr. WISE, and Mr. HERBERT managers at the conference on its part.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6833) "making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year 1889," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 17, 22, 23, 24, 25, and 31.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 19, 20, 21, 26, 27, 28, 29, and 30, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out from said amendment the words "and consul-general;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the sum named in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof "$378,500," and the Senate agree to the same.

As to amendment numbered 16, the committee of conference has been unable to agree.

EUGENE HALE,
W. B. ALLISON,
JAS. B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

PERRY BELMONT,
JAMES B. McCREARY,
WM. W. MORROW,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HALE. The single point on which the conferees failed to agree is amendment 16, which was reported, not upon the appropriation bill from the Committee on Appropriations, but by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and adopted on its motion by the Senate. I send that amendment to the desk to be read, that the Senate may see what is involved in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

For salaries and expenses of a scientific commission of three persons, to consist of one officer of the Army or Navy competent for such service, a geologist and mineralogist, and a naturalist, to visit and report upon the commercial resources of the Upper Congo Basin, its products, its minerals, its vegetable wealth, the openings for American trade, and to collect such information on the subject of that country as shall be thought of interest to the United States, $25,000; and the President may fix the salaries and compensation of the members of this commission at such sum, not exceeding $6,000, as he may deem proper; and said commission shall expire on the 30th day of June, 1889.

Mr. HALE. The conference committee came to a dead-lock on this proposition. The House conferees very strongly opposed it and declared that from intimations which had been given when the bill was last before the House of Representatives it would be impossible for the House to agree to the proposition. They would not consent to its remaining in the bill, and insisted upon its going out.

The Senate conferees did not feel like yielding and receding and letting the proposition go out, all the more because it had not been put on originally by the Committee on Appropriations on examination and investigation, but had been moved by the Committee on Foreign Relations, which had given it its examination and consideration. The Senate had adopted the views of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and therefore to a degree the Committee on Appropriations had not the responsibility of examining and deciding upon the measure.

So the Senate conferees did not feel like receding and letting this proposition go out, but thought it wiser to report it to the Senate, where the Committee on Foreign Relations, which had considered the subject, could be heard upon the proposition, and then the Senate could decide whether it would insist further upon the amendment and have another conference appointed, or whether it would recede and let it go out and allow the bill to go through without it.

I will take no more of the time of the Senate, because I know my colleague is anxious to go on with his bill, and this perhaps, so far as the Committee on Foreign Relations is concerned, is a sufficient explanation. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. SHERMAN] is present, and also the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who took an interest in the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment proposed to establish and put on foot a scientific expedition to the Congo country. It was agreed to unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Relations, so far as I now remember, without dissent. The importance of it was felt by every member of that committee.

The Congo country is the most interesting country now open for the exploration and occupation of civilized nations. It is a country of vast extent, of untold wealth, and of greater undeveloped resources than any other portion of the world.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] took a good deal of interest in this subject, and I think first suggested this proposition. We have had several bills before us in regard to the Congo country, one in regard to the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors in that country, and there are various other propositions affecting the settlement of the country. We have had treaty relations, and have become a member of a community of nations, I may say, which have substantial control of that country, headed by Belgium. It was deemed of vital importance that we should take our share in the development and occupation of that country by our commerce and our trade.

There is no doubt that if that country should be opened to civilized nations the United States could send a great variety of raw material there, its oils, its petroleum, and largely agricultural implements and coarse cotton goods. Being in a warm climate cotton goods would be introduced probably in the first elements of their civilization, and they would be largely manufactured in this country; and agricultural implements, shovels, spades, hoes, and the like, and a great variety of articles might be sent there if trade was opened.

At present we have no such relations there, and no such information as will enable Congress to decide what ought to be done. It was thought that the cheapest and best way would be to send a highly intelligent body of officers to explore the country, to report upon its resources, upon the prospects of trade there, and then we should have information upon which we could legislate.

I can see no reason in the world why, if the House of Representatives were as well informed upon the subject as the Senate has been compelled to be informed by engaging in treaty negotiations, the members of the House would not readily agree to the amendment if they examined the question.

I do not wish to say anything further about the matter. Although I had no connection with the introduction of the original proposition in regard to the Congo country, I have no doubt that this expenditure would be a very important one, yielding very valuable results.

I should like to have the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is more familiar with the subject, and to whom have been committed various bills in relation to the Congo country, state his view of the question.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Government of the United States was the first Government to take cognizance of the existence in the Congo Basin of a form of government which, it is true, was very crude and inefficient at first, by the recognition of the flag of that country as one of the flags entitled to respect among the nations of the earth. I think that many persons at the time supposed that that was rather a vain essay in the direction of trying to build up a state out of some benevolent enterprise on the part of scientific men and explorers; but very soon the nations of Europe, I think twenty or twenty-one of them, including the United States plenipotentiary at Brussels, called a congress, and they did in regard to the Congo country, which had been explored by Mr. Stanley under American auspices, what had never before been done with reference to any wild, savage country in the world. They agreed upon a certain series of principles, I may call them, which ranked with the principles of international law as applied to the Congo Basin, under which these different governments engaged with each other that there should spring up and be developed within that country whatever of civilization may take place there under mutual agreements for the preservation of the peace and for the security of explorers and persons engaged in traffic of every kind, and also under agreements between themselves in regard to the tariff revenue, the taxation which may be imposed upon the commerce of the world.

Our Government, falling back upon the ancient idea of keeping out of entangling alliances with foreign powers, declined to become a party; at least the President declined to recommend that the United States should become a party to that convention, very much to my regret. I think the convention was not properly understood, because at first we had a mistranslation of it, which the honorable Mr. Kasson kindly consented, under a resolution of the Senate, to correct. In my opinion we ought to have become a party to that convention.

I think that the Government of the United States, without reference to any other fact in connection with the proper development of the Congo country, owes a very peculiar duty to that country. We have here a large mass of population, brought to us in slavery, who have become comparatively a very enlightened people, certainly the most enlightened large body of negro population which ever existed in the world anywhere. They are progressive; they are industrious; they are intelligent. They have ideas of government the same that we have; they have a very good understanding of it, and they participate with us in the administration of the affairs of this Government.

Many of those people have grown up to wealth in the Southern States; they command large amounts of capital which they have treasured up. Many of them have enterprise; they have sagacity; but we do not find them taking hold of American institutions. I do not suppose there is a negro bank president in the United States. There is no negro president of a railroad company in the United States. There is no negro president of any large corporation unless it may be some benevolent or eleemosynary establishment of their own. They do not catch hold of those enterprises which are calculated to develop wealth, and to develop genius and talent and to increase and improve the experience of men in this country, and I do not think they will in a great many years to come do these things.

In the basin of the Congo there is unquestionably, from Stanley Pool away out to the eastern lakes which supply the waters of the Congo River, a very vast expanse of country that even in its native condition furnishes an immense treasure to commerce. They have native productions there which have only to be encouraged by the negroes who inhabit those wilds, as I call them, to be very useful in commerce; among others, India rubber and the palm-nut, which yields a very valuable oil, sugar-cane, bananas, and a great many products, and ivory of course, which is collected from the herds of elephants that have heretofore been found in that region of the world; and the capacity for the improvement of agriculture and for the development of mines in that country is something that is said by travelers to be very extraordinary.

Following up this very rapid and peculiar and wonderful development of research and of political organization in that country, this Government at the very outset sent out a gentleman, Mr. Tisdel, who failed in his health there, as a great many people do who go out there, and who came back with a report which, while it was to some extent satisfactory, did not really go beyond Stanley Pool. He confined his operations to the Lower Congo River and to that intermediate belt of country which is occupied by rapids between Vivi and Stanley Pool, so that his explorations were not of very much consequence. Then the Navy Department sent out Lieutenant Taunt. He made a report, which was printed by order of the Senate during the last Congress, that is very interesting indeed. It gives an idea, it is true not a very particular idea, but at the same time one that is reliable, I have no doubt, which provokes the imagination in respect to that country in a very extraordinary degree. I do not know that I ever read a synopsis or skeleton description of a country that seemed to contain more of interest than is disclosed in the little brief report of Lieutenant Taunt.

Now I thought, and the Committee on Foreign Relations thought, that it was a proper thing for us to do to send out a scientific mission there. For what purpose? Not merely for the purpose of writing books or gaining information that might be merely for the moment interesting to read, but to lay down the foundation facts upon which commerce can be established between this country and that.

It occurs to me that if there is a country in the world that is open to the enterprise of the negro race, it must be the great valley of the Congo. We ought not to shut the doors to such an enterprise as that. We ought to encourage it. If these people can not attain to the highest reach and power and civil capacity of every kind in our midst, do we not owe them the duty, having brought them as slaves from that country, to open the gates of Africa to them, so that they may go back and traffic with their own people and promote commerce in the midst of the African population? Have they not a better natural right to reap the wealth of Africa than any other race of people in the world?

I should be delighted to see a line of steamers between Charleston and New Orleans and the mouth of the Congo River. I think it ought to engage the attention and interest of every American citizen, and especially of gentlemen from the South. I feel like throwing open every door of opportunity to these people, and as we know that the customs and usages of society and the prejudices of race close the avenues to these people in this country, if they are closed here I want them opened for them abroad. It seems to me that that is a most inviting field.

This may all turn out to be a mere romance, a mere effort of the imagination to grasp something beneficial for the negro race, but it does not seem so to me. I think there are great, substantial, material advantages in that Congo country which the African population of this country, encouraged by us, can lay their hands upon, and I would give them by the legislation of Congress peculiar privileges in the organization of commerce and in the running of their ships for the purpose of engaging in that commerce.

We may say what we like about it, but after all, "blood is thicker than water," according to the celebrated axiom; and I would say that if a Congo negro who wanted to furnish traffic of any kind found the money and the capacity for trade in the hands of an American negro, he would prefer him to a white man to trade with. I should think so. I believe that these people would enter the Congo country with a masterful advantage, growing out of race prejudice and race affiliation, over any other race of men who might trade there.

There is more than that in it, Mr. President. Slavery has been abolished in Brazil; it has been abolished practically in Cuba and various other countries; but still we know, according to the report of Mr. Taunt and the report of all others who visit that coast, that the Portuguese and a great many other people in the world to-day carry on a slave-trade upon the coast of Africa. It is not as high a class of trade as the old cooly trade from China. They make some little promise that the negro himself does not understand when he finds himself in the hands of the slave-catcher in the interior, that they will carry him off to some island or to some coast and keep him for so many years and return him to his native land with a certain amount of calico or cotton or the like of that; but the man never gets back.

I think that the United States Government owes it to itself, it owes it to its traditions, it owes it to its treaties, it owes it to its own character in every respect, that it should be looking into that country and seeing what is going on there. So I thought it was right for us to send out this commission, and I can not understand what it is that prevents it from being carried into effect after the Senate has voted it, unless it may be an impression on the part of the House of Representatives that it is a matter of no consequence. But the slightest study of this question ought to convince gentlemen, it seems to me, that this is a matter of very serious consequence, of real importance, and that it involves on our part the performance of a duty which is of a very high and a very delicate character.

Mr. HALE. I am entirely willing to take the sense of the Senate as to what course shall be pursued by the conferees. Unless some other Senator desires to discuss the subject, without trenching upon the time of my colleague, who is in charge of the river and harbor bill, I move that the Senate further insist upon its sixteenth amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should like to say a word. I can not help feeling very great regret that the House conferees have had any hesitation whatever upon this subject. This Congo country, now so recently opened to the gaze of white men and to some understanding of what it contains, is, so far as we know, one of the most fertile countries that exist on the face of the globe. It abounds in every species of tropical production, palm-oil and the oil of the other trees that go into commerce—I have forgotten the names of them—ivory, spices, India rubber, and so on. To make it very brief, the whole resources of tropical nature are in the fullest exertion there in producing the things that are convenient for the welfare of man. The population is very numerous, of course of uncultivated and comparatively wild and savage black men.

Under the auspices of the United States as the real aider of the Belgians in the enterprise (the United States being the first to recognize the national existence of the independent state of Congo, which has been formed there by the leading chiefs) Congo has got an attitude among the European nations and really with us, although we were not a party to the convention which regulated how the European nations should act in their trade there. But it has become opened to the operations of civilized commerce, and Germany, Great Britain, France, Italy, and other nations are looking to that country and are now engaged in facilitating commercial intercourse there for the benefit of their own people in the way of trade, to get rid of the surplus products of the industry of their nations, which I think is a very good thing for them to do.

It is proposed by the House of Representatives that we shall really stand idly by, or stand back, unwilling to afford our citizens, by an examination and investigation of that country, information about it as to what objects and subjects of our industry can best find a market there, and what products we can get in return, and to make our people familiar with the resources of the country and opportunities for trade there. It is proposed that we shall stand idly by and see our European rivals, with the friendly antagonisms of commerce and production, absorb the whole of that new field which is opened to commerce and the productions of men. I do not like it.

The United States has too long occupied the attitude of standing silently and idly by and seeing our rivals, in what I think I have properly characterized as the commercial antagonisms and competitions of the world, cover the globe. Wherever the morning birds sing to the rising sun, those nations, Germany, Great Britain, and France, have been pushing their enterprises to every continent and to every island for the purpose not of gaining the political control of the world but of gaining the control of its trade, to find outlets for their productions, and thus increase the wealth of their people, while we stand dumb and silent, incapable of managing to consume our own products (as of course we can not, our people are so industrious and our resources are so great), and wonder why it is that our farm products do not bring more, that our manufacturing products do not bring more, and that there is always a surplus, like the boy at the brook waiting until it shall have run out so that he may pass over.

I think we ought to adopt a different and a better policy, and this is one of the first steps toward it in this direction. I hope that the Senate will insist upon the amendment, and insist unanimously.

Mr. HALE. The Senate conferees endeavored to impress upon the House conferees the considerations which have been presented here, not of course with the force and vigor and eloquence and imagination to which we have listened to-day; but the conferees on the part of this body did the best they could, suggesting these views and suggesting to the representatives of the other body a broader and wider policy for the American people to pursue when that fertile land opens to our trade and commerce, as it does now, a land widely populated, needing our products. However, we failed to strike any fire into the minds or hearts of the House conferees. They remained stolidly immovable to all of these considerations, and declared that under no conditions, unless instructed by the House that they represented, could they consent to this proposition remaining in the appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator be kind enough to inform the Senate, if he can, what action the House of Representatives has taken upon the report of the conference committee?

Mr. HALE. The report is now first presented under the rules in the Senate. I am for one glad that the discussion has taken place, so that the House of Representatives may have the benefit of this discussion when it first considers the subject on the report of the conference committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand that the House of Representatives has taken no action whatever.

Mr. HALE. The House of Representatives has not yet acted upon the conference report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it disagreed to the Senate amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that.

Mr. HALE. Under the rules the report is made here first; but the House of Representatives, by voting to disagree to the Senate's amendment, has planted itself in opposition to the amendment, and in that position it has been sustained by the conferees appointed by the House. I should like the Senate to feel that the Senate conferees in this case are met by a hitherto firm and immovable body on the other side.

I move that the Senate further insist upon the sixteenth amendment, in order that this matter may go into further conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the report of the conference committee will be agreed to, and the Senate will still further insist upon amendment numbered 16, and ask for a further conference with the House of Representatives.

Mr. HALE. I do not know—the Chair is better informed on the rules than I am—whether at this stage, as the House has not acted upon the report, the Senate should ask for a further conference or do anything more than insist upon its sixteenth amendment; and then when the House has considered the conference report further action may be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be left then in that way. The Senate agrees to the report and still further insists upon its sixteenth amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 3239) granting a pension to Frederick Wunoch, late of Company H, Twentieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, and Mr. CALL submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ALLEGED NAVAL DESERTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. CHANDLER, and Mr. GRAY.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives for reference.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 187) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government was read the first time by its title.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to have the joint resolution read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read the second time at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That all appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws which shall remain unprovided for on the 30th day of June, 1888, be, and they are hereby, continued and made available for a period of thirty days from and after that date, unless the regular appropriations therefor provided for in bills now pending in Congress shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889; and in case the appropriations, or any of them, hereby continued are or is insufficient to carry on the said necessary operations, a sufficient amount is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry on the same: Provided, That no greater amount shall be expended therefor than will be in the same proportion to the appropriations of the fiscal year 1888 as thirty days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year: Provided further, That authority is also granted for continuing during the same period the necessary work required for public printing and binding, and for all other miscellaneous objects embodied in the sundry civil, Army, District of Columbia, legislative, executive, and judicial, and naval appropriation acts, in advance of appropriations to be hereafter made for said objects: And provided further, All sums expended under this act shall be charged to and be deducted from the appropriations for like service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

Mr. PLATT. I do not wish to object to the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations, but I merely wish to remark now that it is very extraordinary, and, as it seems to me, a very sad thing that after Congress has been in session for seven months it should be necessary to present at the end of seven months a joint resolution of this kind. I hope the Committee on Appropriations will carefully consider the question whether any such resolution should be reported favorably or passed, and whether it would not be better, for the future at least, to leave the Departments to get along as best they can until the appropriation bills are regularly passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Committee on Appropriations will not report the joint resolution until the middle of next week, at the earliest, if they shall be compelled to report it then. As a matter of course, the Government can not be conducted without appropriations, but the enormous expense and labor imposed on the different Departments of Government by such a measure can not be estimated or appreciated by members of the Senate. I happened to be in a position where I saw that labor performed twice under circumstances of great difficulty. I know how much expense is incurred, what additional accounts are opened, and how difficult it is to keep the accounts, and how embarrassing it is. It runs clear through the year. I hope the joint resolution will not be reported back before the middle of next week.

Mr. HALE. What method does the Senator suggest shall take the place of this resolution in view of the fact that it will be literally impossible to pass the appropriation bills before the commencement of the next fiscal year?

Mr. SHERMAN. I imagine that several of the appropriation bills referred to in the joint resolution can be passed before the middle of next week.

Mr. HALE. None except the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the most difficult of all to extend in this way.

Mr. HALE. But the question is raised by other appropriation bills which it is impossible to pass in that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I ask is that the Committee on Appropriations will hold the joint resolution back as long as it can so as to get as many of the bills as possible out of the way, because the expense involved and the discouragement and trouble in keeping accounts under a resolution of this kind are very great indeed.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree with the Senator from Ohio that the joint resolution ought not to be passed until the last moment. I think it ought to be passed late on Saturday, in order that it may take effect on the 2d certainly, if not on the 1st of July.

Mr. SHERMAN. A few days would make no difference.

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps two or three days might not make any difference.

I wish to say to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] that I can not conceive that it is the fault of the Senate that the appropriation bills have not been passed so as to take effect on the 1st day of July. The naval appropriation bill came to the Senate last Monday. Of course our committee has not had time to mature that bill and present it to the Senate. The sundry civil bill, which is the most important perhaps of all the appropriation bills, did not reach this body until Tuesday last, the day before yesterday, and it was only printed yesterday. It is of course absolutely impossible for the Senate to consider with any care a bill of that magnitude between now and the 1st day of July, so that whatever happens the bill appropriating money for the Navy and the sundry civil bill must go over beyond the 1st of July before they can become laws.

There are other bills which are hanging between the two Houses. The agricultural appropriation bill is an important bill. It passed this body on the 14th day of June, I think, after having reached the Senate about the 1st day of June. Yet that bill has not been heard of since that time. The House of Representatives has asked no conference, it has not agreed to our amendments, and the bill remains in that body. The conferees on the part of the two Houses have been in session on the District of Columbia appropriation bill for two days, occupying most of the time. I hope, and I believe they hope, that before Saturday evening they will be able to agree upon the disagreeing votes with respect to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, but I think whatever happens it may be taken for granted that the naval appropriation bill and the sundry civil bill can not be passed before the 1st of July.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think this might be as good a time as any to ascertain whether there is competence enough in Congress to keep the Government going by regular and proper appropriations that both Houses have had time enough to consider carefully in detail. If the Senate is really to have any place in the administration of the Government, or if the case were reversed, the House of Representatives is, we might as well begin to say now to the House of Representatives, with the utmost kindness, that if they are unable to send appropriation bills to the Senate (and they insist upon the right to originate them) in time to have them fairly and deliberately considered before the Government is stranded for want of money, the responsibility is theirs, and whatever evil happens must fall where it belongs; and that we ought not to be compelled, year after year, as we are, or two years after two years (for this is not the first occasion), to resort to this most embarrassing and improper expedient of bridging over indefinitely after the 1st of July by these universal provisions to carry on the last year's appropriations and give money enough to do it for an indefinite period of time until some other law can go into effect. Nothing will justify such legislation except some extreme emergency, which may sometimes arise, but in the peaceful and regular order of business in carrying on this Government there is no excuse for it whatever.

The occasion to which the Senator from Ohio refers, I think, or the most of it, arose from the fact that the two Houses of Congress, both of them, were determined that there should be no appropriations to carry on certain branches of the Government until the President of the United States would, against his judgment, consent to the repeal of certain legislative provisions that existed in the statutes of the United States which a majority of the two Houses thought, or professed to think, ought to be repealed. He did not think so, and they put these repealing and modifying provisions into appropriation bills. He could not conscientiously approve them, and the two Houses said on that occasion by their action and as a result that they would not have any appropriations at all for the Army, for instance—I remember that was one of them—unless the President of the United States would consent to the repeal of general provisions of the statutory law having no relations to appropriations at all That was one affair.

But this instance relates purely to matters of appropriation. There has been no contest between the two Houses, or between either House and the President, on any subject of the general laws of the land. It relates purely to the ordinary operations of carrying on the Government, and I confess I am unable to see how, after more than a half a year, at the very last month of the time, these appropriation bills, some of them, are coming along now, and we are asked to grant this universal and widespread and inscrutable authority to the administrative departments of the Government to go on upon the basis named in this provision. It is not good legislation, but until the Senate has sufficient firmness to say that it can not consent to carry on the Government in that way it will of course continue.

Mr. ALLISON. I ought to say that the statutes provide now that no person in the employ of the Government shall receive pay for any service until that service has been appropriated for by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. And it must be paid out of appropriations made for the year. The unexpended appropriations of a former year lapse into the Treasury and can not be used.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no doubt of that. Therefore, unless this joint resolution shall pass, the Government, so far as its conduct relates to these several appropriation bills, must stop. That is the situation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, the pay must stop.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if there is not a provision in the statutes which declares that the executive officers of the Government shall not receive the gratuitous labor of employés?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, there is.

Mr. HALE. This form of legislation, objectionable as it is, has been resorted to not in fugitive cases as suggested by the Senator from Vermont. It is not a good way of legislation, undoubtedly, but it has been done time and again. We have got into the way of doing it at every long session that runs over the 1st of July, and there are few Senators here who remember any long session of Congress which has not exceeded that time. We have fallen into the fashion of passing such a resolution, and it comes up in this way now. I see no other way except to pass it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it important, in view of what has been said, that action should be taken this afternoon upon the Army appropriation bill. If the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will give way, I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. FRYE. It was understood yesterday that I should yield for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks that the pending order be informally laid aside that he may move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Has unanimous consent been given to proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Not yet.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa that I was instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs this morning to propose an important amendment. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will kindly waive any technical objection he might make against that amendment when the time comes, I shall not be disposed to object to the consideration of the bill to-day. I do not feel like losing my opportunity to present the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that I shall make no objection to-day to the amendment suggested by the Committee on Military Affairs that I would not make to-morrow; that is to say, I shall waive any objection because of time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length, and, if there be no objection, the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be acted upon as they are reached in the reading.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 103, after the words "expenses of," to insert "not exceeding fifty;" in line 104, after the words "contract-surgeons," to insert "not exceeding one hundred and sixty;" in line 105, before the word "veterinary," to insert "not exceeding fourteen;" and in line 106, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "eighty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay and traveling expenses of not exceeding fifty contract-surgeons, not exceeding one hundred and sixty hospital matrons, and not exceeding fourteen veterinary surgeons; in all, $85,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 108, after the word "each," to insert "not exceeding thirty;" so as to read:

For pay of not exceeding forty-two paymasters' clerks, at $1,400 each, not exceeding thirty paymasters' messengers, and traveling expenses of paymasters' clerks, in all $80,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out the clause from line 123 to line 128, inclusive, as follows:

For the pay of a clerk attendant on the collection and classification of military information from abroad, $1,500; and the officers detailed to obtain the same shall be entitled to mileage and transportation and also commutation of quarters while on this duty, as provided when on other duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 136, after the word "troops," to insert "when authorized by law;" and in line 137, after the words "one hundred," to insert "and fifty;" so as to read:

For mileage to officers when traveling on duty without troops, when authorized by law, not to exceed $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the first proviso to the same clause, in line 140, before the word "usually," to insert "shortest;" and in line 141, after the word "thereto," to strike out "when transportation from the Quartermaster's Department can not be furnished;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That in disbursing this amount the maximum sum to be allowed and paid to an officer shall be 4 cents per mile, distance to be computed over the shortest usually traveled routes, and, in addition thereto, the cost of the transportation actually paid by the officer over said route or routes, exclusive of sleeping or parlor car fare and transfers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the use of the word "shortest." It seems to me to be a very serious interference with the convenience of officers, and I do not see any object in inserting it. For instance, the shortest route from here to Chicago is by the Baltimore and Ohio road, while the usually traveled route is by way of the Pennsylvania Central. Now, is it right for us to legislate so as to require an officer to travel by one road rather than another? To say "by the usually traveled route" gives the officer at least some reasonable facility about choosing the road. I do not see any reason for the insertion of the word "shortest."

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he thinks an officer who in going to Chicago travels over the Pennsylvania road rather than the Baltimore and Ohio would violate this provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think he would.

Mr. ALLISON. They are both "usually traveled routes."

Mr. SHERMAN. I know, but under this provision he must take the shortest route. Otherwise how would he get his allowance with the word "shortest" in the bill? In many cases it would cause great inconvenience. Senators will see that it is sometimes necessary to have a choice of routes. I would leave the officers to take the usually traveled route, and not compel them to go over a particular road.

Mr. ALLISON. They take any route they choose with this provision in. Of course the paymasters have a table of routes. The officer takes the route he chooses. His mileage, then, is fixed by the shortest route, just as we are paid our mileage.

Mr. SHERMAN. Our mileage is on the usually traveled route, but we take our choice. If we should take any other than the usually traveled route, if we should attempt to go around by Cape Horn, or New York, or anything of that kind, we should only get mileage for the usually traveled route.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee heard no complaint respecting this language. It is the existing law.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALLISON. I know.

Mr. SHERMAN. However, I do not want to interfere in a matter of that kind.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that if we find any difficulty about it, it will be considered in conference.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the end of the second proviso to the clause making appropriations for mileage of officers, to add:

And provided further, That the Quartermaster's Department shall not furnish transportation to officers traveling without troops otherwise than by conveyance belonging to said Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 155, after the word "pay," to strike out "and general expenses;" so as to make the clause read:

Making in all, for pay of the Army, $12,676,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the clause making appropriations for the subsistence of the Army, in line 195, after the words "traveling to," to insert "and;" in the same line, after the word "from," to strike out "and at;" and in line 199, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

For the payment of the regulation allowances for commutation in lieu of rations to enlisted men on furlough, to ordnance-sergeants on duty at ungarrisoned posts, to enlisted men stationed at places where rations in kind can not be economically issued, to enlisted men traveling on detached duty when it is impracticable to carry rations of any kind, to enlisted men selected to contest for places or prizes in the department, division, and Army rifle competitions, while traveling to and from places of contest; in all, $1,745,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War; and not more than $110,000 thereof shall be applied to the payment of civilian employés of the Subsistence Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the clause making appropriations for incidental expenses of the Quartermaster's Department, in line 255, after the word "surgeons," to strike out "and of a riding and training master for the more thorough instruction of officers and cadets, a sum not exceeding $1,500;" and in line 264, after the words "six hundred and," to strike out "seventy-six thousand five hundred" and insert "seventy-five thousand;" so as to read:

And for the following expenditures required for the several regiments of cavalry, the batteries of light artillery, and such companies of infantry and scouts as may be mounted, and for the trains, to wit: Hire of veterinary surgeons, purchase of medicine for horses and mules, picket-ropes, blacksmiths' tools and materials, horseshoes and blacksmiths' tools for the cavalry service, and for the shoeing of horses and mules, and such additional expenditures as are necessary and authorized by law in the movement and operations of the Army, and not expressly assigned to any other Department, $675,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the clause making appropriations for "Army transportation," in line 288, after the word "water," to strike out "of the necessary agents and employés;" so as to read:

Army transportation: For transportation of the Army, including baggage of the troops, when moving either by land or water; of clothing, camp and garrison equipage and other quartermaster's stores from Army depots or places of purchase or delivery to the several posts and Army depots, and from those depots to the troops in the field.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, line 304, after the words "hire of teamsters," to strike out "and other employés."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 326, to reduce the total appropriation for Army transportation from $2,800,000 to $2,700,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 331, to strike out the additional proviso at the end of the clause making appropriations for "Army transportation," as follows:

And provided further, That no expenditure authorized by this act from the appropriations made herein for the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, including the transportation of troops and their supplies, and the expenses incident thereto, shall be made except by the Quartermaster-General, under the direction of the Secretary of War, unless an emergency exists that demands immediate action; and in such case the expenditure necessary to meet the emergency may be made upon the order in writing of the general commanding the Army, or upon the order in writing of division or department commander in whose jurisdiction the emergency arises; but every such order from a division or department commander shall certify that an emergency exists requiring immediate expenditure, stating the emergency necessary to be met.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the clause making appropriations for the "Medical and Hospital Department," in line 407, after the word "general," to insert "post;" in line 412, after the word "diseases," to insert "and the supply of the Army and Naval Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark.;" in line 415, to insert "and five" after "two hundred;" and in line 416, after the word "over," to strike out "thirty-eight" and insert "forty-three;" so as to make the clause read:

Medical and Hospital Department: For the purchase of medical and hospital supplies, including disinfectants for general post sanitation, expenses of medical purveying depots, pay of employés, medical care and treatment of officers and enlisted men of the Army on duty at posts and stations for which no other provision is made, for the proper care and treatment of cases in the Army suffering from contagious or epidemic diseases, and the supply of the Army and Navy Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark., advertising, and other miscellaneous expenses of the Medical Department; in all, $205,000; and not over $43,000 of the money appropriated by this paragraph shall be applied to the payment of civilian employés of the Medical Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "Engineer Department," after line 444, to insert:

For repairs to sea-wall and wharf at Willets Point, New York, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations "for Ordnance Department," in line 466, after the word "cavalry," to insert "and artillery;" so as to make the clause read:

For infantry, cavalry, and artillery equipments, including horse equipments for cavalry and artillery, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 469, after the word "national," to strike out "armory" and insert "armories;" so as to make the clause read:

For manufacture, repair, and issue of arms at the national armories, $400,000: Provided, That not more than $60,000 of the money appropriated for the Ordnance Department in all its branches shall be applied to the payment of civilian clerks in said department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 473, at the end of the clause making appropriation "for manufacture, repair, and issue of arms at national armories," to add the following proviso:

Provided further, That the cost to the Ordnance Department of all ordnance and ordnance stores issued to the States, Territories, and District of Columbia, under the act of February 12, 1887, shall be credited to the appropriation for "manufacture of arms at national armories," which appropriation for 1889 and thereafter shall be available until exhausted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 484, after the word "same," to strike out "for armaments" and insert "all complete and mounted in place ready for;" so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase by the Secretary of War of pneumatic dynamite guns of different calibers, and the necessary machinery to fire and handle the same, ammunition, and carriages for the same, all complete and mounted in place ready for military use, $400,000, or so much thereof as he may deem proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 488, after the word "gun-carriages," to strike out "and plants for the same and" and insert "aerial torpedoes;" so as to make the clause read:

For examining, testing, and experimenting with pneumatic or other dynamite guns, gun-carriages, aerial torpedoes, dynamite shells and ammunition, and batteries for coast defense, whether sunken, counterpoise, or otherwise, brought to the notice of the Secretary of War, $100,000, or so much thereof as he may deem proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 493, to insert:

For the manufacture, or purchase, and test of cannon and carriages, including two 10-inch carriages maneuvered by power, one of which shall be a disappearing carriage, and also including those for the field and siege services; for the alteration of carriages on hand to adapt them to improved service guns; for projectiles, powders, fuzes, and implements, their trial and proof; for experiments in the means of protecting torpedo lines; for compensation of draughtsmen while employed in the Army Ordnance Bureau on ordnance construction, and for the necessary expenses of ordnance officers while temporarily employed at the proving ground and absent from their proper stations, at the rate of $2.50 per diem while so employed, $600,000: Provided, That all purchases of materials under this provision shall be of American manufacture.

Mr. GORMAN. I did not agree in committee to this provision proposed to be inserted. I think it properly belongs on another bill.

Mr. DOLPH. To what provision does the Senator refer?

Mr. GORMAN. The provision on page 21, commencing with line 494. It is an appropriation of $600,000. I simply desire to say that it ought to be considered at another time.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is very difficult to hear the Senator. May I ask on what bill this could more properly be placed?

Mr. GORMAN. I think it belongs to the deficiency bill or the fortification bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. But a large part of this is for the general uses of the Army. I wish to move an amendment to the proposed amendment of the committee. I move to insert in line 499, after the word "projectiles," the words:

And increased facilities for their manufacture.

The amendment as it stands provides for the manufacture or purchase and test of cannon and carriages, etc., but the Ordnance Department desires to spend a small fraction of this $600,000 in improving some of the machine tools. It is a matter of plain, straightforward business and in perfect harmony with the rest of the amendment. I make the proposition at the request of an officer of the department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not ask a change of the total.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Connecticut handed this amendment to me in the early part of the day, and now states that it is proposed to use a small sum for the purpose of increasing the facilities for manufacturing projectiles. This is a lump appropriation of $600,000 for these various purposes. I do not know that I should object to having a small sum designated for the purpose suggested by the Senator's amendment, but if it is only necessary to use a small sum for that purpose I prefer that he should modify his amendment so as to add a proviso saying, "provided that a certain sum (whatever may be necessary) may be used for increasing the facilities for the manufacture of projectiles."

I have here a statement in answer to a request addressed to the Secretary of War, to furnish a project of the methods of expenditure of this appropriation. The Secretary of War is very anxious that this appropriation should be inserted in this bill, differing somewhat from my friend from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] on that subject, and in his statement I find nothing for increased facilities for manufacturing projectiles. So it seems to me the provision, if inserted at all, should be inserted in the nature of a proviso and specifying a specific sum.

Mr. HAWLEY. The same authority that suggested the whole amendment here made this suggestion, and spoke of it as a desirable thing. If the chairman of the committee makes no objection, let this lie over a few moments. I expect one of the officers here, and I will ask him what is necessary for the purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paragraph proposed to be inserted, with the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, will be passed over informally, and the reading of the bill will be resumed at line 510.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for "Signal Service," in line 529, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to read:

Signal Service:

For expenses of the Signal Service of the Army, as follows: Purchase, equipment, and repair of field electric telegraphs; signal equipments and stores; binocular glasses, telescopes, heliostats, and other necessary instruments, including absolutely necessary meteorological instruments for use on target-ranges; telephone apparatus and maintenance of same; in all, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be authorized to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the 225 acres of land on the Hudson River, directly south of the military reservation at West Point, belonging to the estate of Edward V. Kinsley, or so much thereof as he may deem necessary for the purposes of the Military Academy, and to receive offers for the sale of their interest in such land from such of the heirs of said Kinsley as are competent and willing to sell such interests; and the Secretary of War is authorized to submit all offers so made and the question of the value of said 225 acres to a board to consist of three Army officers and three competent civilians, who shall make due investigation and report concerning said value; and the Secretary of War shall submit said offers and the report of said board, with his opinion, to Congress, at its next session. The expenses of said board and compensation at the rate of $10 a day for not more than ten days for each of the civilian members shall be paid from the appropriation or contingencies of the War Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 20 of section 2, before the word "contingencies," the word "or" should be "for;" so as to read:

Be paid from the appropriation for contingencies of the War Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee on page 21, line 494. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment, to insert, after the word "projectiles," "and increased facilities for their manufacture."

Mr. HAWLEY. That may wait a moment longer. I move now to add to the bill the amendment I was directed to report from the Committee on Military Affairs, which is printed and on the desks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

SEC. 3. For the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for an army gun factory for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance, to be erected at the Watervliet Arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., in accordance with the recommendation of the Gun Foundry Board of February 16, 1884, $750,000.

SEC. 4. For the purchase of rough-finished, oil-tempered, and annealed steel for high-power coast-defense guns of 8, 10, and 12 inch caliber, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection at each stage of the manufacture, and including all the parts of each caliber, $5,000,000: Provided, That no money shall be expended except for steel accepted and delivered.

SEC. 5. The material for the guns provided for in section 4 shall be purchased in accordance with section 3709, Revised Statutes, for which purpose the Secretary of War is authorized to make contracts with responsible steel manufacturers, after proper advertisement, continuing not less than thirty days in the newspapers most likely to reach the said manufacturers: Provided, That each bidder with whom such contracts shall be made shall agree to erect in the United States a suitable plant, including the best modern appliances, capable of making all the steel required, and of finishing it in accordance with the contracts, and shall further agree to deliver yearly a specified quantity of each caliber, the time of the delivery of the steel for the smaller calibers of heavy guns to commence at the expiration of not more than eighteen months, and that for the largest calibers specified in the advertisement at the expiration of not more than three years from the date of the acceptance of the contracts; and that all the material for said guns shall be manufactured in the United States.

SEC. 6. For the purchase of submarine mines, for needful casemates, cable galleries, and appliances to operate submarine mines; for continuing torpedo experiments and for practical instruction of engineer troops in the details of torpedo service, $500,000.

SEC. 7. For the purchase of submarine controllable torpedoes or torpedoes and torpedo-boats controllable from shore and adapted to coast defense, $100,000.

SEC. 8. The appropriations provided for in sections 3, 4, 6, and 7 shall be available until expended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to treating these various paragraphs as one amendment? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I submit that the amendment is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland will state his point of order.

Mr. GORMAN. First, the amendment is not germane to this bill; second, it is not estimated for; and next, it has not been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations one day before being offered in the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. First, the Senator says it is not germane to the bill; but the whole purpose of the bill appears to be to organize, arm, pay, and equip an army; and as this can not go very well upon the naval bill, and as it did not necessarily go upon the fortifications bill, because the building of fortifications does not necessarily imply their armament, I see no possible objection to its being put upon the Army appropriation bill. Certainly on page 20 we find an appropriation provided for "for the purchase of * * * pneumatic dynamite guns of different calibers, and the necessary machinery to fire and handle the same, ammunition, and carriages for the same, all complete and mounted in place ready for military use, $400,000."

Now the point is fine if we may spend $400,000 to buy dynamite guns, which are in a large sense still in the stage of experimentation, and we may not provide for the manufacture of some forged, built-up steel cannon of modern steel whose value is unquestionably established by the science of the world and by the usages and practice of all military nations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of relevancy is not debatable.

Mr. HAWLEY. As I have said all I need to say on that point, I will not contest the matter with the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The contest is with the Senate, not the Chair. The rules say it shall be decided without debate.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have forgotten now what the other point was.

Mr. GORMAN. The point was that it has not been estimated for, and has not been offered and referred to the Committee on Appropriations one day.

Mr. HAWLEY. As to the point that it is not estimated for, I do not know how much of technical truth there is in that objection, for I have not the Book of Estimates by me at this moment; but I beg leave to say that the substance of it has been demanded by the annual report of every Secretary of War for ten or fifteen years, and by every annual report of the Bureau of Ordnance.

The general proposition, the essence of this measure, has been reported favorably by four or five of the best and most elaborately constituted boards we have ever had on the subject of the armament of the country, the Getty board, the Armament Board, the Fortifications Board, composed of eminent officers of the Army and Navy and eminent civilians; the Gun Foundry Board, composed of the very best men in the Army and Navy for that purpose, and who made an elaborate examination of gun-making machinery and plant in this country and in Europe.

The Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships of the Senate devoted a year and a half to visiting the leading steel establishments of this country and the leading gun and ship building establishments of Europe, and to an examination of many prominent skilled experts in all this business, an examination of literature of Europe generally upon it, and they came to the conclusion that these things were needed. Whether the War Department sanctions every word of this amendment and has asked for it I can not say. Of course we do not expect them to submit elaborate estimates every year for the cost of fifty or seventy-five or one hundred guns, for they confine themselves to showing that guns are absolutely necessary, and that we have not got any, leaving it to Congress in its discretion to prescribe the manner of purchasing or building them.

The Senator from Maryland is mistaken in another respect. This amendment comes from the Military Committee, which, to be sure, met only this morning, not having met for a week before, and it was not expected that the Army appropriation bill would be reported so soon from the Appropriations Committee. But as soon as possible after the organization of the Senate to-day I reported this amendment, which came fresh from the Committee on Military Affairs, and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

I do not think the points of the Senator from Maryland are good; but I wish he might waive them, so that we might have the merits considered. I do not feel like going into the merits until the point of order is decided.

I asked the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations when he reported the bill to-day to waive any points of order he had, and he knows very well the conversation between us. I rose when he asked unanimous consent to take up this bill to intimate that I possibly, unwillingly might, if my vote would do so, postpone its consideration unless he would intimate to me that he would not raise a point of order on the admission of my amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Connecticut stated that $400,000 was appropriated, as I understood, for four pneumatic dynamite guns.

Mr. HAWLEY. The price of these new guns is not quoted in the market; but the sum here appropriated by this bill would answer for ten fine guns and the necessary steam-engines or condensers for condensed air. I believe the idea is that they will cost $40,000 apiece.

Mr. ALLISON. These pneumatic dynamite guns are to cost $40,000 each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland insist on the question of relevancy?

Mr. GORMAN. I do.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the Senator would waive it until I can make some statements on the propriety of this amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. One moment, before that point is made. I wish to say in response to the suggestion made by the Senator from Connecticut that when I asked unanimous consent to take up this bill to-day the Senator from Connecticut intimated that he might not consent unless the amendment which he offered this morning from the Committee on Military Affairs and sent to the Committee on Appropriations should also be considered, and in response to that suggestion I stated that I would make no objection to the introduction of the amendment to-day that could not be made to-morrow. In other words, I should not make the point to-day that the amendment had not been sent to the Committee on Appropriations for a sufficient length of time, and I hope in any suggestion of points of order the Senator from Maryland will help me keep that agreement.

Mr. GORMAN. With great pleasure I withdraw that part of the point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator was not in at the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Maryland to insist on the question of the relevancy of this amendment. The rules require that the question of relevancy when raised shall be submitted to the Senate and decided without debate. The question, therefore, recurs, Is this amendment germane or relevant to the bill?

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask, for the information of the Senate on that question, that the clause from line 487 to 493, inclusive, of this bill shall be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be debate, but the clause can be read by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANDERSON. Perhaps there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

For examining, testing, and experimenting with pneumatic or other dynamite guns, gun-carriages, aerial torpedoes, dynamite shells and ammunition, and batteries for coast defense, whether sunken, counterpoise, or otherwise, brought to the notice of the Secretary of War, $100,000, or so much thereof as he may deem proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators in the affirmative will say "ay."

Mr. HAWLEY. What is the question precisely?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the third clause of Rule XVI, or so much thereof as applies to this point.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

3. No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto; and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question therefore recurs, Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut germane or relevant to this bill?

The question was determined in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of relevancy is decided in the affirmative. The question then recurs on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GORMAN. I make the second point, that there is no estimate for this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Even if that were so, if the amendment had been reported by order of a standing or select committee, it would still be in order, and it has been reported, the Chair understands, from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think there is an estimate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is immaterial whether it has been estimated for or not. It has been reported by a committee.

Mr. DOLPH. There is an estimate of $8,239,000 for this very year.

Mr. TELLER. Let the estimate be read.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the Secretary read the item on the top of page 177 of the Book of Estimates.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

	Estimated amount required for each detailed object of expenditure.	Total amount to be appropriated under each head of appropriation.
Gun and mortar batteries—
For construction of gun and mortar batteries for defense of our chief seaports: For Portland Harbor, $290,000; Boston Harbor, $280,000; Narragansett Bay, $290,000; New York, $690,000; Philadelphia, $210,000; Baltimore, $80,000; Washington, D. C., $80,000; Hampton Roads, $250,000; New Orleans, $210,000; and San Francisco, $460,000. (Submitted)		$2,840,000.00
Torpedoes for harbor defenses:
For closing channels leading to our principal seaports. (Submitted)	$300,000.00
Preparing mining casemates and cable-shafts and galleries to render it possible to operate submarine mines at Portland Head, 3; Boston, 5; Narragansett Bay, 2; New York, 5; Philadelphia, 2; Baltimore, 1; Washington, 1; Hampton Roads, 2; and San Francisco, 5. (Submitted)	1,560,000.00

Mr. HAWLEY. I submit that it is not necessary to read further. What has already been read shows clearly that the estimates are made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I trespass on the Senate a few moments to say why I press this particular proposition?

I do not wish to argue the whole case as to whether it is necessary to arm our coasts or not, but I make the broad statement that a nation of more than sixty millions of people, with their almost incalculable wealth, can not resist a first-class ship of China, Japan, Chili, or any one of the nations of Europe.

I make the broad statement that every one of our great ports is open to complete capture by a fraction of the navies of any one of the great powers of Europe; that ships can go past any of our forts with their guns and levy upon the cities; that there is not in the possession of the Army on the coast of the country a single modern gun. The whole Army has not a single modern built-up steel gun. It has only the old-fashioned heavy cast-iron smooth-bores, and the Parrotts, which kill more friends than enemies.

I ask by this amendment that there may be a beginning of the manufacture of the proper guns for the fortification of our coasts. The experience of Europe is in favor of the plan proposed here—joint work between private manufacturers and the Government. The experiment has been tried to satisfaction of conducting these large establishments wholly by Government; it has been tried to satisfaction conducting them wholly by individuals; and the latter, I must confess, so far as my recollection goes, answers better than to conduct them by the Government entirely. But the plant required to enter upon the manufacture of the proper modern built-up rifle is very large indeed, and differs in many respects from the plant required for ordinary commercial purposes; and no wise manufacturer of steel will make a contract with the Government unless it be large enough to justify him in putting in new machinery.

Take one single element of it as an example—the steam-hammer. An appropriation, I will not dare to say of how much, would be required for the old steam-hammer; but that is substituted now by a vastly improved machine, an extraordinary machine, too, known as the hydraulic forging machine, which will take a mass of thirty, forty, or fifty thousand pounds of steel, a cubic ingot of it, and work it as the cook works the dough in the kitchen, thereby making a homogeneous mass of steel of approximately equal tenacity and strength all the way through.

It will cost hundreds of thousands of dollars to put up that forge alone. I have seen one of them working upon a trifle of 16 tons of steel at once, and capable of working 40 or 50. One is already being put up in this country now by the concern which successfully bid for the making of the armor and the parts of heavy guns for the Navy. The Navy has got ahead of the Army in this, far ahead of it. The country could not resist the demand for a regeneration of the Navy. Successive bills passed Congress ordering the building of ships, not of the first class, not of the most offensive class, but cruisers, the sea police, the beginning of a navy, the light horse of the Navy, and some partially protected cruisers.

After Secretary Whitney found that adding together such armor as he was required to have for a number of these ships, and adding together the number of guns that he was directed to get, he would be able to offer to some manufacturer a contract for six or seven thousand tons of forged armor and forged parts of heavy guns, anticipating the necessity, anticipating the absolute necessity that the Government would sooner or later begin the manufacture of these things, one of the great steel works began in advance to make the appropriate plant at a cost of anywhere from $800,000 to $2,000,000 and upwards, so that it was able to take beyond all competitors immediately that contract offered by the Secretary of the Navy.

Now the Navy has thirty-four steel cannon of the modern style, very good indeed, of moderate sizes, nearly done, and it is authorized to contract for one hundred and eight more steel pieces, running up to something like a 10-inch gun, a very effective and heavy gun. In the mean time the Army has not one single gun of that description unless you may count an experimental steel gun, I believe, nor has the first step been taken towards their creation.

Without waiting to furnish the details, I lay down the proposition that the way to do this is to ask private manufacturers to forge, anneal, temper, and even shape the parts of the big guns, and then bring them to a finishing and assembling shop. One for the Navy is well under way here. You are going to have an admirable establishment at the navy-yard in this city. It is admirable now so far as it has gone. There should be another for the Army, which it is settled should be at Watervliet. There these pieces are finally turned to the thousandth or the fraction of a thousandth of an inch. The jacket is slipped on to a central tube on the gun, other jackets are put on it, and bands of steel, very much as we remember the tires of the wheels in the old way of putting them on. There a gun is built up which is as nearly as possible—it depends on the skill shown—what the gun would be if it could all be made in one piece.

The way is now, I say, to get private establishments to forge these large parts and bring them to the Government concerns that will put the last touches and the assembling upon them. That is what the Navy are doing. The Bessemer Steel Works are building a part of the guns for it, and the Navy people are assembling and getting them together at the navy-yard here. That we want done for the Army. The Navy is one hundred and forty-two guns ahead of the Army, thirty-four built and one hundred and eight to be built; but we have not one upon our whole coast, not one that can check the first, and second, or third class ships of the navies of the world.

We must begin. It takes time. This $5,000,000 looks like a large item, but it can not be paid out under three or four years, and the last section of the amendment provides that it shall be a continuing appropriation and shall not be turned into the Treasury in the usual way at the end of two years. We do not expect anything to be delivered within that time unless it be some parts of the light and trifling 6-inch gun—we call it trifling nowadays though it carries a projectile that will go through six of our ships of the Navy side by side.

We do not expect much from these forging establishments for some considerable time—a year or a year and a half, I think. If one is started to-day, it will probably be eighteen months before it can be forged, and we do not require the pieces of the large gun to be delivered under three years.

I hope this contract will not go to the Bethlehem Steel Works simply because I want another establishment set up, and I would not care if there were three of them in the country who, while answering such stray commercial demand as might come along for steel shafting, would be ready all the while to enter into the manufacture of heavy guns for us, for a considerable number of them we must absolutely have.

This simply makes a beginning. It is the first step towards wiping out that shame which rests upon us of being an absolutely defenseless people.

I do not argue that question. I will not insult the Senate by arguing the question whether it is right for a people to be in a condition of defense. You can not argue, Mr. President, with a foreign nation with nothing behind you. Your argument is not worth a farthing when the high temper of controversy arises and the war spirit begins. They look at you with a tremendous argument in your fist, but a bubble behind you, and what do they care?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the experience which I have gained on the committee that the Senator from Connecticut spoke of will not permit me to allow anything to pass this body silently when I shall have an opportunity of voting for a proposition to put our people and our Government in a condition adequate for coast defense. That committee made a very exhaustive examination of all these subjects, with the assistance of some of the very best scientific ability in the United States, and we came to a gratifying conclusion, on which, I think, everybody is now united, that we have all the material in the United States necessary for the manufacture of ordnance of the heaviest and best description. We have the talent and genius amongst our mechanics, we have the enterprise amongst our manufacturing capitalists, and we have everything but the encouragement of the United States to some person or persons to engage in this very heavy enterprise.

There is but one customer in this country for heavy guns, and that is the Government of the United States. Unless we step forward and make a beginning in this direction there is nobody that is competent to do it. No private company or man is going to invest his money in a gun factory on the mere idea that he may be able to sell guns to some foreign country. There must of necessity be some home encouragement to these enterprises before they can be started. We must start at some time. We have really started later than we ought to have done.

We started two or three years ago in the same direction where the Secretary of the Navy found himself able to start by congregating certain appropriations made in one bill and another so as to purchase the steel. If we had started in the same direction and had the same opportunities for the establishment of a gun factory and the machinery for the production of heavy guns in this country three years ago, we should now have had an establishment that we could rely upon.

Things go pretty fast in the world just at this time. Steam propels ships with great rapidity, and electricity carries messages in the twinkling of an eye across the sea, so that nations that have any expectation that they will be allowed to pursue any other than a certain settled policy ought to be prepared, in a certain degree at least, with the means of defense. We need establishments in the United States, we need foundations for these heavy compressers, these heavy hammers, whatever may be the best, to weld and to prepare by hammering and otherwise the large billets of steel that are now requisite for making steel guns.

I notice a $400,000 appropriation in this bill for mere experimental purposes in regard to dynamite guns. In regard to steel guns the experiment, I think, has been made. I think the world has probably attained to as high state of perfection in the manufacture of steel guns as will be attained at all, unless we can find some means by which we can make a cast-steel gun cheaper and stronger than a built-up gun. I think that after having waited so many years for the purpose of gaining the enlightenment that comes from the experience and scientific efforts of the different nations of the earth on this subject, we can now afford to say to ourselves that we can make as good a gun in the United States as can be made in any other part of the world, and that perhaps it is not necessary to wait any longer for the scientific genius of the world to develop a better gun than can now be made out of steel.

The science of gun-making having reached this very high plane, it seems to me now that we ought to enter upon it with confidence, adopt what science has developed, and proceed to make our foundations with a view of putting our country in reach of all the necessary agencies to meet any emergency that may come upon us. If we had to-day in the United States such a gun factory as Krupp's establishment in Germany, it would add immensely to the moral power of the United States, and I think that there is scarcely a Senator here who has ever bestowed any attention upon the relations of the United States with foreign countries who has not felt that there was some necessity for more moral power in this Government than we possess. The moral power of this Government is not at all equivalent to its sixty-five millions of population, its vast wealth, its great ocean boundaries, and its enormous resources of every kind and character.

This Government in its power of command and control over the nations of the earth, in the moral sense of which I speak, is not up to the realization of its actual facilities, its actual inherent power. What do we need? Nothing at all but some action on the part of the Government to show the nations of the earth that we are prepared to use these great facilities and these extraordinary resources immediately whenever occasion may demand, and that if an emergency should arise we shall not go and have to waste three or four or five hundred million dollars in making the preparation that experience and attention and care and scientific endeavor and effort ought to have developed slowly and completely.

I agree with the Senator from Connecticut that the best thing we can do is to give Government support to private effort in making guns. The experience of Germany has established that proposition. Why was Krupp a better gun-maker than any other man in the world, and why is his steel reckoned among the very best in the world? It was because that faithful and common-sense old man worked from his early manhood all along with experience and preparation in the best methods of manufacture, and then with the best pattern of gun that could be put together, and every gun was examined with critical and scrupulous care before it was put in.

Krupp's steel was what made Krupp's guns. Krupp's patience and care, his individual effort devoted to the building up of his establishment, that made it a success. What was it that animated Krupp? Not merely ambition or glory. He had not any office under the German Government the duties of which he was performing under a salary. He was a private man, but he had the Government for a patron; and he had a German's pride in the glory of his country, and then he had a personal fondness for money-making to stimulate him to build up these great guns. It was through these simple agencies that that man got such power over the gun market of the world as that all the nations, nearly without exception I believe, more or less, patronized his great establishment.

Now, if we start in the United States a gun factory, or if you will enable our people by contributing as we ought to do to the manufacture of guns to build the machinery that is requisite for the manufacture of these great guns, it will not be very long, not a great while, until you will find that San Francisco will be making guns out of that unparalleled steel ore that they have there and sending them across the Pacific Ocean to China and Japan, and down the South American coast, and on this coast we shall be manufacturing guns for the eastern market of South America and Central America, and for the old countries as well, because if you give our men the advantage they have the genius and the enterprise to do anything that ingenuity and capacity can accomplish.

So I am in favor of the proposition. I want us to start, and we had just as well start now, and commence with this appropriation of $5,000,000, as to start later, and a great deal better start now than start later. We ought to have this establishment started; this steel ought to be in process of manufacture, and all of the experience of our mechanics, the better parts of it, ought to be gathered into establishments of this kind.

Now, in regard to the dynamite gun, that is a very different thing. There is very little known about dynamite projectiles or dynamite guns. I understand that we have to have steam-engines for the purpose of making compressed air in order to get a powerful expanding element to project the projectile out of the gun without exploding the dynamite before it reaches the target at which it is aimed. That is experimental. We are willing to bestow $400,000 in this bill on making that experiment. It is very doubtful whether after all we shall provide a dynamite gun that will take the place of a steel gun in the navies of the world or that will enable us to arm a ship with dynamite to go out and fight the enemies of this country on the high seas.

I confess that I should dislike very much to see the best man-of-war that we could build sent out for the purpose of engaging a man-of-war of equal power with steel guns on board his ship and nothing but dynamite on board of ours. I think that would be a very hazardous experiment.

It has been but two days since I read that a patent had been issued here with thirty-three claims allowed by the Patent Office in favor of an Alabamian for a dynamite gun by which he proposes to throw the dynamite, not with a great steam-engine, but with 40 or 50 or 100 pounds of powder, and do it with absolute security. If that man's invention is what it appears to be, and what I really believe it to be, we shall not have spent $400,000 under this bill until that man will come in with a dynamite gun that will dispense with the engine entirely, and he will fire it like an ordinary steel gun.

That is experimental; and I think when the Congress of the United States is willing to bestow $400,000 upon a project that is peculiarly and entirely experimental, after the investigations that have been made by a committee of this body and a report that has received the sanction of the War and Navy Departments both, and a report that is incontrovertible on its facts and conclusions, we should not be unwilling to expend what the Senator from Connecticut proposes to expend in his amendment in building guns about which there is no longer any experiment at all, but the mere putting into actual physical use the result of those experiences which have been collected by this committee and by the scientific men of this country, and which are absolutely controlling in regard to the manufacture of these guns. I shall therefore vote for the amendment.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I regret to see the Senate about to commit itself apparently to an appropriation for the manufacture of steel guns.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Maryland has the floor, and being advised that there are a number of Senators who desire to speak, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 29, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 28, 1888.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The House was called to order at 11 o'clock a. m. by Hon. JOHN B. CLARK, its Clerk, who said:

The Clerk of the House has received the following communication from the presiding officer:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 28, 1888.

SIR: As I am compelled to be absent from the city for two days, you will please request the House to elect a Speaker pro tempore to serve during my absence.

JOHN G. CARLISLE.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Clause 7 of Rule I provides that in the absence of the Speaker, or his omission to make an appointment of a Speaker to preside during his absence, it is for the House to proceed to elect a Speaker pro tempore.

Nominations are now in order.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. JAMES H. BLOUNT, a Representative from the State of Georgia, be and he is hereby, elected Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT accordingly took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NOTIFICATION TO THE SENATE.

Mr. MILLS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to inform the Senate that the House has elected Hon. JAMES H. BLOUNT, a Representative from the State of Georgia, as Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

FOG-SIGNAL, ETC., STONINGTON HARBOR, CONNECTICUT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Light-House Board of appropriations for a light and fog-signal at the entrance of Stonington Harbor, Connecticut; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY H. LANSDALE VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copy of findings of fact in the case of Henry H. Lansdale vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ST. CECILIA'S ACADEMY VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copy of findings of fact in the case of St. Cecilia's Academy vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE OVER THE CANEY FORK RIVER, TENNESSEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 1526) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Caney Fork River, between Rock Island and Carthage, in Tennessee, with House amendment disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the Senate non-concur in the amendment proposed by the House to this bill, and have asked a conference thereon.

I have examined the amendment and find it is only formal in its character, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the House recede from its amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the amendment?

Mr. CRISP. I ask that it be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after line 28, add:

"And if said bridge shall not be finished within two years from the passage of this act the rights and privileges hereby granted shall be null and void.

Mr. CRISP. I will state that by mistake that clause is put twice into the bill. This is a Senate bill amended by the House, which amendment was disagreed to by the Senate, and I ask the House to recede.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE BETWEEN BRIDGEPORT AND SHEFFIELD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 1524) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Tennessee River between Bridgeport and Sheffield, Ala.

Mr. CRISP. This is a Senate bill to which the House attached two amendments, one of which the Senate agrees to; and the other, which is identical with the amendment just stricken from the former bill, they reject. I ask that the House recede from its insistence upon that amendment.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

IMPROVEMENT OF BRAZOS RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 2831) for improving the mouth of the Brazos River, in Texas; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LYNCH, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. MORRILL, for one week, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to Mr. FULLER to withdraw papers accompanying House bill 8680, for the relief of Fannie A. Boyd.

BRAZOS RIVER, TEXAS.

Mr. CRAIN. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House bill 10165, and that the same be put upon its passage.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Brazos River Channel and Dock Company, a corporation organized under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Texas, be, and are hereby, authorized, on the conditions hereinafter mentioned, to construct, own, and operate such permanent and sufficient jetties and such auxiliary works as are necessary to create and permanently maintain, as hereinafter set forth, a navigable channel at the mouth of the Brazos River, Texas, between said river and the Gulf of Mexico, and so far into the mainland and between the banks of the said Brazos River as may be necessary to reach a place that will afford security from storms, swells, cyclones, and tidal waves, for the purposes of furnishing the vessels and boats adapted to the purpose facilities for navigation in and along the entire length of said channel, charging and collecting such toll therefor as may be prescribed by the regulations that may be made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in conformity with the laws of the United States; and for that purpose they may construct, in the river, and likewise in the Gulf of Mexico, such walls, jetties, dikes, levees, and other structures, and employ such boats, rafts, and appliances as they may, in the prosecution of said work, deem necessary: Provided, That no such structures or means employed shall hinder, delay, or materially interfere with the free navigation in said river or between said river and the Gulf of Mexico; and, to protect their said works, they may build and maintain such levees or embankments as may be necessary to secure their permanency along the banks of said Brazos River; and said Brazos River Channel and Dock Company shall hold the United States harmless from any damages that may accrue to any person or persons by overflow or otherwise caused by the construction of said walls, jetties, dikes, levees, and other works constructed by said company: Provided further, That unless the construction of the proposed work shall be substantially commenced within one year from date of the approval of this act, and prosecuted with due diligence, the provisions contained herein in relation to the said improvement shall be null and void; and unless the said Brazos River Channel and Dock Company shall secure a navigable depth of 12 feet of water from a point in the river so far as may be necessary to reach a place that will afford security from storms, swells, cyclones, and tidal waves, above its mouth and extending from said point to a depth of 12 feet in the Gulf of Mexico, outside of the present bar, within three years after the date of the approval of this act, Congress may revoke the privileges herein granted in relation to said improvement. And Congress may revoke the provisions hereing granted in relation to said improvement, unless the said Brazos River Channel and Dock Company shall, after securing 12 feet of water, secure an additional depth of not less than 2 feet during each succeeding year thereafter, until 18 feet shall have been secured; and in case said Brazos River Channel and Dock Company shall fail to comply with the foregoing conditions as to depth of water, and time, for any period of twelve months in excess of the time fixed as aforesaid, then the privileges herein granted, in relation to said improvements, shall absolutely become null and void without action by Congress.

SEC. 2. That the works of improvement in the said Brazos River, from the mouth of said river to the point described in section 1 of this act, shall consist of the construction of dikes, wing-dams, levees, embankments, and dredging or other means which may be considered by said Brazos River Channel and Dock Company necessary for obtaining a depth of 18 feet of water between the mouth of said river and said point described in section 1 of this act; and that the said Brazos River Channel and Dock Company may, if they shall decide it best for the interests of navigation, change the course of said river at the sharp bend in said river between the mouth of said river and the said point described in section 1 of this act, but in making such change the channel shall be made of sufficient depth and width to receive the volume of said river without disturbance of its regimen.

SEC. 3. That if at any time during the construction of said jetties and auxiliary works, or after said jetties and auxiliary works shall have been completed, and said channel of 18 feet in depth has been obtained, the United States shall have the right to pay the said Brazos River Channel and Dock Company the value of their jetties and other works constructed under and by the authority granted to said company by the State of Texas as well as by the authority of this act, and on such payments being made by the United States all right to said franchises and works on the part of said Brazos River Channel and Dock Company shall cease.

SEC. 4. That any person maliciously or intentionally injuring said works or interfering with the construction thereof shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be tried for such offense before the district court of the United States for the district wherein such offense may be committed, and if found guilty he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $1,000 or to imprisonment not more than two years, or both fine and imprisonment as aforesaid for each offense.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. In consequence of the confusion in the House the reading of the first portion of the bill was not very well understood. I would like to have the nature of the bill explained.

Mr. ROWELL. I do not think that bill ought to pass the House. It proposes to allow a private corporation to take charge of a navigable river. I think that is a bad principle.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman allow me two minutes to explain the bill?

Mr. ROWELL. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw his objection?

Mr. ROWELL. I withdraw the objection in order to permit the gentleman to explain, reserving the right to renew the objection.

Mr. CRAIN. The bill is almost exactly the same bill that was reported on the same subject from the Senate this morning. The only difference between the two bills is that the Senate bill omits the provision that this company shall hold the United States Government harmless for any damage done in the construction of the work. The bill before the House is a substitute unanimously reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It simply grants to a corporation the right to improve the mouth of the Brazos River, which work the Government engineers have given up as impracticable, and which has been abandoned by the Government. The charges to which the gentleman refers are to be regulated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MILLS. I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. CRAIN. I only ask two minutes.

Whenever the Government of the United States deems it proper to do so, it has the right to purchase all these works and to deprive the company of its franchise. That is the whole bill.

Mr. ROWELL. I do not see any reason for passing a bill of that kind. If this improvement is practicable, the United States ought to make it.

Mr. MILLS. I now ask for the regular order.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask the gentleman to give way for a moment to allow me to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLS. I will withdraw the motion to dispense with the morning hour and let the committees be called.

RUFUS LOWE AND C. M. LOFTIN.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 10578) for the relief of Rufus Lowe and C. M. Loftin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MAJ. GEN. W. W. AVERILL.

Mr. SPINOLA, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 1650) for the relief of Maj. Gen. W. W. Averill; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPINOLA. Two weeks from this evening there is to be a session to consider several bills of like character with the bill I have just reported, and I ask that it be included among the bills to be considered at that evening session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That request is not in order at this time.

Mr. SPINOLA. Well, I will make it later in the day.

ROCK ISLAND DAM.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Military Affairs have made a favorable report upon a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War for information as to the destruction of the dam at the Rock Island arsenal, but as I understand that the information called for has been fully furnished to the Committee on Appropriations, I suggest that it is not necessary for us to put the resolution upon the Calendar or upon its passage, and I therefore ask that it lie on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BUILDINGS AT HIGHWOOD, NEAR CHICAGO.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 10643) appropriating $300,000 for the construction of buildings for the military post at Highwood, near Chicago, Ill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This bill was ordered to be reported favorably some weeks ago, and would have been reported to the House, but at the request of gentlemen in Chicago we concluded that we would hold the report until after the Army appropriation bill was disposed of, as it was expected that we would make an appropriation in that bill for this purpose. That appropriation has now been made in the Army bill, and I therefore suggest that for the present this bill and report lie on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE TO FILE REPORTS.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. Speaker, there are two or three reports from the Committee on Private Land Claims that I desire to present this morning, but the gentleman who has them in his possession is not present at this moment, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that they may be filed with the Clerk.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call of committees is now completed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments, non-concurred in by the House of Representatives, to the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the President pro tempore had appointed Senators SHERMAN, ALLISON, MANDERSON, COLQUITT, and BERRY members on the part of the Senate of the committee of Congress authorized by the act approved May 28, 1888, to attend the Centennial Exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio.

The message further announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 1503) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Messrs. HALE, CHANDLER, and GRAY.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6833) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year 1889, and still further insists upon its sixteenth amendment to said bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenue. The pending amendment is to strike out lines 133 and 134:

Vegetables in their natural state or in salt or brine, not specially enumerated or provided for.

Debate on this amendment is exhausted, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] is still entitled to two minutes in support of the amendment.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. In the two or three additional minutes allowed me I will withdraw the amendment which I offered yesterday, and move instead to amend by inserting after the words "vegetables" the words: "Such vegetables as are now specifically dutiable under existing law." Under the existing law vegetables in their natural state or in salt or brine, not specially enumerated or provided for, are subject to 10 per cent. ad valorem duty. The proposition is to make vegetables in their natural state or in salt or brine, not specifically enumerated or provided for, free. That provision, unless covered by some amendment which the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means informs us is to be proposed, would put potatoes, and, by a subsequent provision in this bill, beans, pease, and split pease upon the free-list. It would strike down a large agricultural interest in my section of the country, and it meets with the most earnest protest of the agriculturists, especially along the border line, who do not desire that their products shall come in competition with those of Canada or other foreign countries.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I will have printed as part of my remarks a table which has been prepared by Colonel Switzler, of the Bureau of Statistics, comprising a statement showing the imports of wheat and other breadstuffs, provisions, vegetables, eggs, etc., into the United States from the British North American Provinces and all other foreign countries each year from 1868 to 1887. It is a special exhibit of the importations referred to, and I am sure will be of interest to both sides of the House. It shows the magnitude to which the business has grown of importing into this country breadstuffs and eggs (which are free both ways), and I think when the committee come to consider this table and to examine this exhibit of this business they will agree to make a more material modification of the provisions of the bill than that which is now proposed.

I shall also incorporate in my remarks an article from the New York Tribune of June 4, 1888, in relation to the importation of cheap potatoes from Europe.

The following is the article:

[From the New York Tribune, June 4, 1888.]

CHEAP POTATOES FROM EUROPE—DANGER TO THE AMERICAN FARMER IF THE DUTY ON THEM IS REMOVED.

The recent large arrivals of potatoes upon trans-Atlantic passenger steamers, which bring them over practically as ballast, has occasioned no little surprise in the shipping world as well as among dealers in farm produce. A steamer of the National Line arrived here a few days ago with 1,000 barrels of potatoes, and upon inquiry it was found that the freight paid upon them was hardly enough to cover the expense of putting them into the vessel, to say nothing of the transportation of them for 3,000 miles; and, too, they were landed here at a less price than potatoes brought from Newfoundland, which, after payment of the import duty of 15 cents a bushel, are cheaper than the home product. This new departure of bringing potatoes from Europe, together with the proposition in the Mills free-trade bill entirely to remove the duty from potatoes, is causing alarm to everybody excepting the foreign growers and the foreign shipowners.

The receipts of potatoes from Great Britain since October 1 last up to Saturday, were 3,411,840 bushels, against 106,047 bushels for the same period a year ago. There also came 240,249 bushels from the continent, against 19,512 bushels a year ago. This means an attack upon the American farmer, and a more effective one upon his industry if the duty should be entirely removed, as he would then find it useless to cultivate his unprofitable lands; but the Democratic Congress is determined to foster the foreign producer and the foreign capitalist in preference to the American industries.

G. S. Palmer, a produce merchant, who has studied the question thoroughly, said on Saturday: "To remove the present duty of 15 cents per bushel would undoubtedly so flood the market with foreign potatoes that American producers could raise them only at a loss to themselves. The present duty was an equitable one, and it should not be made higher than it is at present, because in seasons when the home crop fails, or is not large enough to meet the home demands, a high tariff would be an injustice. When they are put up in sacks they are easily handled and occupy but little space, and consequently make excellent ballast. The farmers are much opposed to having the duty removed. Foreign potatoes, by being brought as ballast, can be sold cheaper than the home product, but once drive our own farmers out of the market, or remove the home competition, there will be a demand for potatoes that will send up the freight charges, and the potatoes will cost the consumer more than they do now."

WM. F. SWITZLER, Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Bureau of Statistics, May 26, 1888.

I now withdraw my former motion, and move to strike out the pending lines—lines 133, 134. I think the vote had better be taken directly upon this motion.

Mr. MILLS. Let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the amendment heretofore submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] will be regarded as withdrawn, and the motion to strike out the paragraph will be treated as the pending motion. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the motion submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] will be adopted; and I say this in the interest of the farmers all along the northern border of Maine and New York and other States contiguous to Canada. If I had not known that a great deal of what is said by our friends on the other side is little if anything more than a specious argument to sustain their case, I should have been astonished to see proposed in the bill this attack upon the farmer; for if our friends on the other side are great in anything, they are great as weepers over the hard condition of the farmer. I have heard my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] cry over the farmer so many times in this House that I have in sympathy with him almost shed tears myself. My friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] joins in the chorus with such vigor that you would think he saw nothing but the farming interests of this country. And my friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS] presenting this bill to the House in his eloquent, and (considering the badness of his cause) able argument, gave as his principal reason, if I mistake not, for introducing this bill, that it would relieve the hardships of the farmers. Yet, gentlemen now come in here and in these two lines of the bill attack the farmers along the northern border of our country in the most vital particular; for, as we all know, it is upon vegetables rather than upon staple articles which can be transported across the ocean that the farmer makes the largest percentage of profit; from vegetables, more, perhaps, than from anything else, he gets the returns with which he purchases the supplies for himself and his family. Yet in respect to this important part of the farmer's production our friends upon the other side would put him in direct competition with the farmers of New Brunswick, who live in cheaper houses; who have but few of the comforts of life; in whose fields women can be seen working as you do not see them on this side of the border. Those farmers of New Brunswick can sell their productions for a less price, because they need smaller returns. Why, sir, on the line between Maine and New Brunswick you will find the American producer getting 25 cents a bushel for his potatoes, which are taken in the field just as they come and sent to the starch factories, while the farmer on the other side of the line sells his potatoes for but half that price. And the same comparison applies through the whole list.

Allow me to say to my friend from Texas that his argument that the superior skill of the American laborer—skill and the use of machinery—gives to him the facility to labor with more effect, and therefore to get better pay because he produces more, does not apply in this case. It does not require skilled labor to produce the products of the farm on the other side of the line. I know that new machinery, new farming implements, have been introduced; but our progressive Yankees have carried their inventions and their machinery across the border, and you can find there, as well as on this side, your mowing machine, your reaping machine, and all your patented implements of husbandry.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would like to occupy a few moments more.

Mr. MILLS. I now ask for a vote.

Mr. NELSON. I rise to move a pro forma amendment, and yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. MILLIKEN. I hope I shall be allowed five minutes more.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] be permitted to continue his remarks for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLS. I object.

Mr. BREWER. I move to amend pro forma by striking out the words "not specially enumerated or provided for."

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise so that the House may limit debate on this proposition.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MILLS, there were—ayes 74, noes 64.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I make the point that no quorum has voted. Let us have tellers.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is right. The other side should not be allowed to go back on the farmers without telling them why.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BAKER, of New York, and Mr. MILLS were appointed.

Mr. BAKER, of New York (before the count by tellers was concluded). Mr. Speaker, we have agreed that the debate on this proposition be allowed to run for twenty minutes on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentlemen from Texas withdraw his motion that the committee rise?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir; the gentleman from New York and I have made an agreement, which I hope the Committee of the Whole will ratify, that twenty minutes be allowed on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion that the committee rise is withdrawn. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to forty minutes—twenty minutes on each side. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Without the interposition of formal amendments the Chair will recognize gentlemen to speak on the motion to strike out. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] has been recognized.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Chairman, I will only take about three minutes to say all I desire to say on this question. The committee who reported this bill and the gentlemen who framed it do not appreciate the enormous competition which arises between our farmers along the border of Canada and those who reside in Ontario, in the western portion of the province of Canada.

The district I have the honor to represent here lies within 12 miles of the city of Detroit. It is largely a rural district. The great market for the people residing in that district is in the city of Detroit. They take there their vegetables, they take there their grain, they take there all their farm products and exchange them for goods they find in that city. Immediately opposite the city of Detroit, across the river, about three-quarters of a mile, is the province of Ontario, an excellent farming country. There is nothing which prevents to-day the competition in vegetables between the people residing across the river and the farmers of my district except a small tariff duty on potatoes. Are we to remove this duty? If we do what compensation will the people of Detroit or the people of Michigan receive for that gift we are making to the people residing in the province of Ontario. If we are to receive our potatoes and other vegetables from the people of Ontario free, then ought not the people of Detroit and the border States be entitled to pass their products across the river into Ontario free of duty. Yet the Committee on Ways and Means propose to give, without any compensation whatever in return, to the people residing in Canada the right to have the markets naturally belonging to the people of Michigan without any compensation whatever.

I know, Mr. Chairman, it is useless for me, it is useless for any one residing near the border to protest against this act, because it has been decreed this bill is to pass and to pass as reported by the committee as ordered by the caucus. I rise, therefore, merely for the purpose of protesting against it, and protesting in the interest of the farmers who live in my district and whose products are brought in direct competition with the like products from the province of Ontario, which come free into Detroit in opposition to the interest of those whom I have the honor to represent.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. YARDLEY].

Mr. YARDLEY. Mr. Chairman, a large percentage of the people whom I have the honor to represent on this floor are farmers, and in their behalf I have presented to this House petition after petition signed by farmers' granges, by farmers' clubs, and by individual farmers, asking the duty on farm products be increased. Gentlemen on the other side of the House who profess to be interested in the farmers have answered their prayers and petitions by placing the products of the farms upon the free-list.

I submit there should be protection to the American farmer against the importations from Canada and other foreign countries.

The distinguished chairman of the Committeee on Ways and Means tells us that hereafter, some time in the future, a proviso will be brought in which will explain and interpret the provisions of this section. I submit until that proviso is offered this section must be construed as it is written, and as it is written, potatoes, together with other vegetables, are put upon the free-list.

Further along in the bill garden seeds are put upon the free-list. I have the honor of representing several of the largest industries in raising garden seeds in the whole United States. I represent here people who cultivate all kinds of garden seeds, and one gentleman in my own county who cultivates turnip seeds informs me that he has contracted with many farmers in his locality to pay 12 cents a pound for their entire crop of turnip seeds, and yet English growers of turnip seeds offer to deliver (all costs paid) in Philadelphia turnip seeds at 8 cents per pound. While that contract may be a good one for the farmers this year, they will find that after the passage of this bill they will have to compete with foreign importations and can not sell their turnip seeds for more than 8 cents a pound.

Mr. Chairman, we have been told again and again by the gentlemen upon the other side that their hearts are overflowing with love for the farmer, and their chief desire in presenting this bill is to relieve the farmer from excessive taxation, and yet they propose to relieve them by placing garden seeds, beans, pease, and other vegetables upon the free-list.

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, $149,876.07 worth of garden seeds and $519,312.36 worth of vegetables were imported into this country in direct competition with the products of the farms of our own country. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen upon the other side of the House are sincere in their repeated expressions of sympathy for the farmers they will unanimously join with us now in this effort to strike the enumerated vegetables and garden seeds from the free-list, and thus aid us to fairly and honestly protect the products of the farm. [Applause.]

[Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, it will be impossible to know the effect of putting this provision upon the free-list without understanding beforehand just what is now admitted under the language "vegetables in their natural state, etc." Of the imports entered for consumption during the year 1887 of this class of farm products other than beans and pease, the total value was $519,312, upon which a duty of about $51,000 was collected. But what the items are, composing these importations, "vegetables in their natural state, etc.," the committee have not given us any information. In this condition I have taken occasion to ascertain from the Secretary of the Treasury the importations for the last nine months under the clause "vegetables other than beans, pease, and potatoes, imported in their natural state or in salt or brine," and I find that at the ports of Bangor, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Buffalo, Niagara, and Detroit, there were imported under this provision during that period, beets, cabbages, cauliflower, corn, cucumbers, onions, pease, radishes, squash, turnips, tomatoes, and various other vegetables amounting to an aggregate value of $265,904; and I shall insert at this point a table giving the exact amount of each.

The table is as follows:

WM. F. SWITZLER,
Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, May 31, 1888.

I have inserted this table, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of giving the committee that information which they require in taking action upon a provision of this character, and so that the committee will know just what will be admitted free of duty if this provision, as proposed in the bill, shall stand.

We protect to a large extent the products of the farm, and why the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means should strike down these products of the soil and allow them to be imported in competition with our own products I do not understand.

The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, in giving information upon this subject showing the imports entered for consumption during the year 1887, furnishes the Committee on Ways and Means the following:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., May 25, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Of the imports entered for consumption during the fiscal year 1887 of vegetables (other than beans and pease) in their natural state, or in salt and brine, dutiable at 10 per cent., $519,312 in value, the value imported into the port of New York was $228,152.

The collector at that port informs me that during the quarter ending March 31 last the imports under this head comprised the following: Onions, 60 per cent.; beets, 10 per cent., and tomatoes, 5 per cent.; unknown, 25 per cent.

It is probable that this would approximate the percentages of the articles classed under this head imported into the whole country.

Respectfully,

WM. F. SWITZLER, Chief of Bureau.

HENRY TALBOT, Esq.,
Clerk to Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

I desire to submit this in order that the Committee of the Whole may know what is being stricken down by this provision of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Can the gentleman state whether or not Canada imposes any duty upon vegetables?

Mr. BURROWS. I am not positive as to that.

Mr. FARQUHAR addressed the Chair.

Mr. MILLS. How much time is remaining on that side?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOCKERY in the chair). Five minutes.

The Chair understands that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] was to be allowed five minutes in this discussion; but as he is not in his seat, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, as representing one of the border districts of this country, and a large one, I can not but admire the generosity of this Committee on Ways and Means in opening the doors of our Northern markets to the Canadians. I want simply to say here, sir, that the Canadian pays no taxes in our country; he furnishes no roadways for our people; he pays no school rates, and pays nothing whatever towards the support of the Government only through indirect taxation, nor has he any interest in the land, but simply to get American money wrung from the tillers of the soil and take it home with him.

The county in which Buffalo is situated is largely interested in the products of the farm; and the land is divided into small plats, devoted to a considerable extent to vegetable and fruit raising, which employs thousands and thousands of men who get their whole living from that character of occupation in that county. Opposite to us is a good Canadian agricultural district; and all that is necessary, when the bill is passed, is simply to open the market for the Canadians to step across the Niagara River and drive out of business the Erie County farmer. If that is good American policy, let the committee go on and pursue it to its legitimate consequences; but I can assure gentlemen that in that region along the Canadian line you will find intelligent farmers who will give their opinion of this character of legislation when November comes around. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, opposition is made to the insertion of this provision in the bill on two grounds; one is, it is charged on the other side that it puts potatoes on the free-list. Now, by existing law, as stated here often during this discussion, potatoes are dutiable, being named specifically in existing law.

This clause provides—

Vegetables in their natural state, or in salt or brine, not specially enumerated or provided for.

Potatoes are specially enumerated and provided for; hence they do not come within the provision of the clause. Certainly, therefore, it seems to me that no one can justly claim that there is any sufficient reason whatever to allege that potatoes are included or intended to be included in that provision.

But, as I stated before, in order to satisfy the views of gentlemen who might have any honest doubts upon the subject, we have prepared carefully a provision to come in at the close of the bill, which is to dissipate all doubts on the subject.

Now, then, on the merits of this proposition; the gentleman from New York who represents the Buffalo district [Mr. FARQUHAR] says that this provision of the law is in the interest of Canada. It is as much in the interest of the people of the city of Buffalo as any other part of the country in proportion to the amount of imports brought into that country from Canada or elsewhere. The reports show that turnips are largely imported into Buffalo to feed the poor laboring people whose Representative here on this floor is demanding that the duty upon the necessaries of life, upon their food, shall be made higher by striking out this clause while we are trying to reduce the price, so that they may have the necessaries of life cheaper than they are getting them now.

Another large item in the bill is onions. A great many onions are imported from Cuba into the port of New York to feed the working people, the poor laboring people of New York who live on onions among other articles of food. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Gentlemen are trying constantly to keep up the prices of the necessaries of life. They will not even let the workingmen in New York have onions to eat. Onions are among the most healthful vegetables we have. And yet our friends on the other side of the House demand that we shall keep up the price of everything that is necessary to human existence, everything necessary for the working people of this country, for the advantage of those who are interested in producing these things; and only a few of them at that. I want to know, Mr. Chairman, at what point in this bill gentlemen will agree to reduce the taxation? This question constantly confronts us. The taxes must be reduced.

Mr. BRUMM. We will begin with the internal revenue; right there.

Mr. MILLS. You want free whisky. You say so in your platform. We will meet that proposition.

Mr. BRUMM. We want free sugar.

Mr. MILLS. You do not say sugar. You say internal revenue.

Mr. BRUMM. We want free sugar and rice.

Mr. MILLS. You do not say in your platform at Chicago that you want to reduce the duty on sugar nor on rice. The Republican party have overruled what you have heretofore contended for on that subject. Your party commands you here on this floor to ask for free whisky. We will go with you to the country on that question. We demand a reduction on those things that enter into consumption as necessary to human existence. We demand that the tax shall remain on whisky as it is to-day.

Mr. BRUMM. I know you do.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to hear the amendment the gentleman proposes to offer.

Mr. MILLS. I do not propose to offer any amendment.

Mr. CONGER. You said you were going to propose one.

Mr. MILLS. The amendment I referred to is in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Two and a half minutes now remain on the other side of the House.

The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. MILLIKEN. I shall not endeavor in so short a time to answer the bold argument of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], which he has made ever since this bill has been before the House, that on account of better machinery, better labor in this country we are able to contend against the cheap labor that comes in from abroad. His argument does not apply to the case of the farmer along the northern border line. The farmer has to contend with men who can labor as well as he can, and who have as good appliances to labor with.

I desire to call attention to one item in these two lines, cucumbers in salt or brine, that are put on the free-list. That is a large industry in the State of Maine, and directly affects the farmer, the man who raises the cucumbers these pickles are made from. They are shipped in salt and brine to Boston, New York, and to the markets along the Atlantic coast. Without this protection he will have to contend with the New Brunswick farmer, who can raise these cucumbers with cheaper labor and who can raise them with as good appliances as those of our farmer. I am somewhat astonished when my friend on the other side claims this bill is not a sectional measure. There is hardly a product of the farmer who lives along the northern boarder of this country that this bill does not put on the free-list. You attack him in every production. There are only a few staples produced by the farmer that this bill, framed by men who have stood up here to claim they were par excellence the friends of the farmer, does not put on the free-list.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAKER, of New York. As a matter of fairness I think it well to have read from page 6147 of the RECORD the amendment now pending, so that the House may understand just what are its terms.

Mr. MILLS. Has the time for debate closed?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. The amendment is already in the RECORD.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Yes; but let it be read, so gentlemen may understand its provisions.

The Clerk read as follows:

This act is intended and shall be construed as an act supplementary and amendatory to existing laws, and the rates of duty and modification of clauses, provisions, and sections herein specifically made are intended and shall be construed as a repeal of all clauses, provisions, and sections in conflict herewith; but as to all clauses, provisions, and sections in existing laws not herein specifically changed, modified, or amended, the rates of duty now existing shall be and remain in full force and effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER].

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected—ayes 59, noes 68.

Mr. BRUMM. I call for tellers.

Tellers were refused, only 28 members voting in favor thereof.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chicory root, ground or unground, burnt or prepared.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MILLS. I want to move that the committee rise, in order that the Committee on Appropriations may present some business.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I will occupy only a few minutes.

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, during the discussion of the last amendment a remark was made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means which I wish to challenge at this moment; that is, that the Republican party is in favor of free whisky. I think the gentleman did not coolly and carefully intend that statement. A large proportion of the Republican party is in favor of abolishing the internal taxes now existing in this country, not because they are levied upon whisky or tobacco, but because they believe that system of taxation to be unwise.

The assertion that the Republican party is in favor of free whisky is absurd. The Republican party is not in favor of that either in its convention or in its individual capacity, and I take the first opportunity to repudiate it so far as I am concerned. In fact, there is no truth, there is no meaning in the statement. It seems to me, sir, that the great question now before the people is whether protection to American industries shall be continued. The Republican party, I admit, is in favor of the general doctrine of protection, not to one industry but to all industries; and if internal taxation is in the way of that, the Republican party are in favor of repealing that internal taxation. The Democratic party, I think, are in favor of another course; and if the existing internal taxation can be made a means to strike down and destroy protection, they will encourage and sustain it for that purpose and that alone. Mr. Chairman, a man who under these circumstances, with his judgment in hand, would coolly say that the Republican party is in favor of free whisky is a man who might be developed according to the Darwinian theory for countless cycles of time without mounting intellectually to the position of a brevet ass. [Laughter.] I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. MILLS I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] whether he meant that last remark for me. I desire to have it read.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I can repeat it, I think.

Mr. MILLS. Well, repeat it.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. After having stated that I did not believe that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] had expressed that as his real opinion, I said that a man who under all the circumstances would, coolly and with his judgment in hand, assert that the Republican party was in favor of free whisky per se, was a man, etc.

Mr. MILLS. Now, Mr. Chairman, all I have to say is that the platform of the Republican party says that they are in favor of the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes. [Cries of "No!" "No!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. MILLS. Do not interrupt me.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, read the platform.

Mr. MILLS. It says that the Republican party is in favor of the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes. It says that it is first in favor of taking the duty off alcohol used in the arts, and if that does not reduce the revenue enough then it says it is in favor of taking off the internal-revenue taxes, and what does that mean but taking the tax off whisky? Now that is what is understood in the country as favoring free whisky. [Murmurs of dissent on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not at all astonished at the tenderness of gentlemen on this question. It is well known that a majority of the gentlemen on the other side, and a majority of the Republican party, have been opposed to the extreme position which was taken at Chicago. It is known that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has represented a minority of his party on this floor, and when the convention at Chicago was lashed and scourged and driven into taking a position for free whisky, no one sooner than the gentleman from Pennsylvania used the wings of the lightning to congratulate the convention for coming up to the heroic stand which he had taken in advance for his party.

Mr. KERR. I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. MILLS. Oh, you sit down. [Laughter.]

You were then——

Mr. KERR. I want to ask you——

Mr. MILLS. Oh, you sit down. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, it is well known that when we have hitherto asked gentlemen on the other side of the House to name the articles upon which they were willing to reduce taxation they spoke of rice and they spoke of sugar, but there was not a gentleman on that side of the House who said he was in favor of taking the taxation off whisky. For the first time at Chicago the Republican party came up boldly and defiantly and took the position before the American people in favor of retaining taxation on the necessaries of life—on food, on clothing, on the implements of labor, on everything necessary to human existence—and demanded that the Treasury should be emptied of the surplus revenue by taking the tax off whisky. That is the language of their platform; that is the position they have to take before the intelligent judgment of the American people; no amount of disclaimer will be able to satisfy the American people that they do not mean, when they get into power, to reduce internal-revenue taxation, to take the tax off whisky, and, as they are constantly trying to do here during the consideration of this bill, leave the taxation where it is, upon the necessaries of life, or increase it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. As my name has been freely used by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], I ask to be heard for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment. If there be no objection, it will be regarded as withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. I renew the amendment. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that no man who has read or heard what I have said on the subject of internal-revenue taxation at any time since the close of the war is justified in charging me with being in favor of free whisky. I have never favored it. I have advocated the repeal of war taxes, such taxes as Jefferson denounced as "an infernal system," and which were then repealed at the end of eleven years. I have denounced that "infernal system" which Madison and Monroe hastened to repeal at the end of four years, when such taxes had been again resorted to as a war measure. I have demanded that the Democracy shall walk in the footsteps of the fathers of their party, shall maintain its holiest precedents, by relieving from the supervision of the National Government the fields, the factories, and the orchards of the South. I have demanded that they carry out their platform of 1884, which demanded and promised an abolition of the internal-revenue taxes. Gentlemen on the other side can not deny that it was the promise of the Democracy, in their convention of 1884, to the tobacco-growers, the fruit-growers, the distillers of the South that they should be relieved from national surveillance and supervision in their industry.

I have asked that these great sources of revenue be remitted to the people in the States, and under State law to the municipalities of the States, so that those governments which bear the burden of vice, crime, and insanity shall have whatever revenue may be justly derived from a source so fruitful of crime and misery as the whisky business.

I in favor of free whisky! It is a dire party necessity that prompts the leader of the Ways and Means Committee, with whom I have been so intimate, to make such a charge against me personally or as a representative of my party. A Democrat of old, I stand by the teachings of the founders of the party, of the framers and expounders of its doctrines; and I ask the Democracy to-day to keep faith with the people of the South, who were deluded into the support of that party four years ago by its lying promise to remit the internal taxes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of admiration to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in regard to the Democracy. So far as he has spoken in a complimentary manner of that ancient party, I of course appreciate his suggestions. But another gentleman sitting beyond him—I do not know exactly from what part of the country he comes—delivered a sort of temperance lecture to the House, and undertook to refute the suggestion that the Republicans of the country, as they have expressed themselves in their convention, are in favor of free whisky. I am of the opinion that the acts of the people—what they do—go a great way towards establishing their reputation and standing before the community. Now, I find in the papers of the day the statement that at the sittings of the convention at Chicago, held a day or two since, there were consumed 31,250 extra barrels of beer. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

A MEMBER. What Republican paper makes that statement?

Mr. SPINOLA. Now, this looks to me like a very strong piece of prima facie evidence that the Republican party is in favor of free rum, with a little honey, perhaps, mixed in, or a little maple-sugar, according to taste. I learn also that a thousand baskets of champagne were taken to that convention to stimulate and fire it up, to give it the proper spirit, so that it might take the necessary action to present suitable candidates; and, speaking on behalf of this side of the House, I thank them for what they did. Thirty-one thousand two hundred and fifty extra barrels of beer for the benefit of the protectionists—I mean the prohibitionists—of the country is evidence enough to the American people where that party stands. [Laughter.] I wish to read it for the information of the gentleman over there who discovered the missing link. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. What is the authority which you quote?

Mr. SPINOLA. I read from the Evening Wisconsin, Monday, June 25, 1888, and I will read all the items. [Laughter and applause.]

Several MEMBERS. Let the Clerk read it.

Mr. OWENS. They got it for the visiting Democrats. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPINOLA. Democrats do not visit places of that sort, my friend. [Laughter and applause.] I ask the Clerk to read from the Evening Wisconsin.

A MEMBER. What is the politics of the paper?

Mr. SPINOLA. Republican, of course.

The Clerk read as follows:

BARRELS TO A CAR-LOAD—A FREIGHT AGENT FURNISHES A LITTLE INTERESTING INFORMATION.

"Your convention beer figures were pretty correct," said a freight agent to a Wisconsin reporter to-day, "except that the number of barrels of beer in a car-load is only half as great as the Wisconsin stated. A barrel of beer weighs 350 pounds, while a barrel of flour weighs about 200 pounds. A car-load of flour is about 125 barrels, while a car-load of beer is in the neighborhood of 60 barrels. Figuring on this basis, the gross amount of extra beer sent to Chicago last week was 31,250 barrels."

[Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, these two speeches which have been made by the leading Democrats here seem to be on a par with each other, both as to fact and as to inference.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] does not mean to be believed when he says the Republican party is for free whisky, because he knows there would not be enough Democrats left to make up the electoral ticket in half the States of the Union if they had confidence in his statement. [Laughter and applause.]

If he had taken the trouble to read our platform he would have known that his statement is one of those asseverations that are worthy of the dignity of the stump, but not of the position of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives of this country. [Laughter and applause.]

He knows that the Republican party's position on this subject is too simple to be turned in this way, but he also knows that if the Democratic party should even commence a campaign without a false statement its own friends would not recognize it. [Great laughter and applause on the Republican side.] They have to disguise their own position; with that they have been familiar for years, and they are now trying to disguise ours. [Laughter.]

What we said to the country was that having removed all unsuitable taxation, after having tried every other method consistent with the maintenance of the system of protection, that if then it came to us to choose between the internal-revenue taxes and the protective system we should stand by the system of protection to American industry. [Applause.]

Now, if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] means to say he will hang on to the whisky monopoly and give up protection, let him say so, and let him say so openly and manfully, and not get behind miscellaneous sentences which mean both sides—which mean nothing. [Laughter and applause.]

Why here, Mr. Chairman, is a declaration by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, two-thirds Democratic, declaring it is the duty of their representatives to "use their best efforts to secure the immediate repeal of the internal-revenue system, a relic of the war, and no longer necessary to meet the demands of the Government, and because it is oppressive, and fosters monopolies [laughter and applause on the Republican side], and is obnoxious to the interests of our people." [Applause.]

Is the Democratic Legislature of Virginia, two-thirds strong, in favor of free whisky? [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] will tell you that no Democrat has been elected in his State except upon the pledge to use his best efforts for the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes. Is the Democratic party in Tennessee in favor of free whisky?

Oh, the gentleman from Texas had better remember the position he occupies in this House, and disport himself with those things when he finds himself on the far off pampas of his own Texas. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEAVER. In order that there may be no mistake as to the proper interpretation of the platform recently adopted by the Republican convention at Chicago concerning the internal-revenue taxes, I send forward to be read in my time an editorial article under the head of "A grave blunder in the platform," which I find in the Chicago Tribune of June 23.

[Cries of "Oh!" on the Republican side, and derisive laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. That does not hurt us.

Mr. WEAVER. Well, it seems to hurt you, and will hurt you a good deal more during the campaign, so that you will cry out much louder than you are doing now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Why do you not quote from yourself? You may as well give us one of your own speeches.

Mr. WEAVER. Because I propose out of your own mouths to condemn you.

Mr. MILLIKEN. This is not our mouth; it is your own.

Mr. WEAVER. It is a leading Republican organ of the Northwest, and you can not get away from it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Oh, no.

Mr. JACKSON. Send up the platform itself if you want authority.

Mr. WEAVER. Let it be read. It contains your plank on the subject under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Tribune does not propose at this time to enter into any discussion of the Republican tariff plank; but desires before it is too late to ask the attention of the delegates to the extraordinary demand for the repeal of the whisky tax. The platform first declares in favor of repealing the tax on alcohol used in the arts and for mechanical purposes—a policy which has always been met with the objection that it would be impossible of enforcement on account of frauds, and would amount virtually to free whisky. However that may be, the platform goes on to declare further:

"If there should still remain a larger revenue than is requisite for the wants of the Government, we favor the entire repeal of internal taxes [whisky and tobacco]——

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask if those words are not in brackets, and if they are not interpolated into that clause of the platform?

Mr. WEAVER. Let the Clerk continue the reading.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I want it to be read properly. Let us know the facts. [Cries of "Regular order!" on the Democratic side.]

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

rather than the surrender of any part of our protective system at the joint behest of the whisky trust and the agents of foreign manufacturers."

Four years ago the Republican party pledged itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff and reduce the surplus. Now, it is made to demand the placing of whisky and tobacco on the free-list in order to prevent any reduction of the surplus by correcting any inequalities of the tariff or by reducing the sugar tax. The Republican tariff platform of 1884 in substance declared:

"The Democratic party has failed completely to relieve the people of the burden of unnecessary taxation by a wise reduction of the surplus. The Republican party pledges itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff and to reduce the surplus."

Is putting whisky on the free-list an honest redemption of this pledge?

Mr. WEAVER. Now that certainly is entitled to great weight. In the first place it gives the platform word for word on that subject in connection with the internal-revenue taxes, and then follows the comment of the editor. I repeat, this is from one of the leading Republican newspapers of the Northwest. [Cries of "Oh, no!" on the Republican side.] It is not only correct in its interpretation, but it cites the language of the platform, so that there can be no disputing it.

What is the difference between the two sides of the House? The Republicans say they want imports "checked"—that is the language used—checked upon all articles that can be produced in this country. Not which are produced, but which can be produced. Then they want, rather than abandon the protective policy, such legislation as will repeal the internal-revenue taxes. If that does not include whisky and tobacco, what does it include? It also includes the repeal of the oleomargarine tax which was enacted by the last Congress for the benefit of the farmers and dairymen of this country. Gentlemen, do not undertake to shirk the issue. Stand up like men. It is impossible to get away from the plain issue presented. You can not run away from it. We accept the issue on this subject, and will go to the people confident of the result. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There should be no shuffling——

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WISE. I am a Democrat, and I am in favor of the repeal of the tobacco tax. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Well, this bill provides for that.

Mr. WISE. But the gentleman mentioned the tobacco tax as if it was a test.

Mr. WEAVER. Certainly; but this bill makes provision for that and takes off a part of that tax.

Mr. WISE. And if there is to be debate on that subject, I want to be heard myself.

Mr. WEAVER. I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia that his position in favor of the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes is not in harmony with this bill.

Mr. WISE. My position is in harmony with the national Democratic platform of 1884. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEAVER. I want to ask the gentleman if he is not standing upon his platform of 1888?

Mr. WISE. But the platform of 1888 indorsed the platform of 1884.

Mr. WEAVER. Then of course you stand upon it?

Mr. WISE. I stand where I have always stood, in favor of the repeal of the tobacco tax.

Mr. WEAVER. Then you are all right. We do repeal a great part of it in this bill. It is one of the last taxes I would repeal, because it is a voluntary burden. The tax-payer can exempt himself from the burden at any time by simply quitting the use of the weed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FARQUHAR rose.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I want to make a correction before that motion is considered. When this editorial was read at the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa I called attention to the fact there was an interpolation in that part of the platform which was quoted. I think it is entirely unfair to this House to have an article read in this manner when there is no possibility of making verbal correction, even where the error is so palpable.

But, sir, I want to call the attention of this House now to a piece of sophistry—I was about to say an exhibition of cowardice—manifested in the article which is quoted from the Tribune, a paper for which I have great respect, having been an employé on it for many years. When the gentleman from Iowa sent up one of the planks of the Republican platform to be read, and permitted it to be read without calling attention to the fact that there is an interjection of a private opinion incorporated or interpolated into the platform, I say it is unfair and should not be permitted to stand in the RECORD in that shape.

I now ask the attention of the House for one moment, with the permission of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. I simply desire to read the platform as it stands:

If there should still remain a larger revenue than is requisite for the wants of the Government, we favor the entire repeal of internal-revenue taxes rather than the surrender of any part of our protective system at the joint behests of the whisky trusts and foreign manufacturers.

The Tribune publishes that plank, but in publishing it the editor interjects in brackets, after the words "internal-revenue taxes," the words "whisky and tobacco," which are not named in the platform. That is merely the inference of an individual and a sophistry from beginning to end. I am astonished that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], who is generally fair, should ever permit such an interpolation to be read from the desk of the American Congress. That is a question that belongs to the Republican party. It does not belong to Mr. Medill or to any man to say what is meant by the language. If the platform is to be read before this House, let it be read in a manly and fair way, and not in a catch-penny manner.

Mr. WEAVER. It was read as published, interpolations and all.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Most certainly; but no attention was called to the interpolation that an editor had put his views into the Republican platform.

Mr. WEAVER. Let me ask you a question to show that Mr. Medill is perfectly fair. Do not the internal-revenue taxes include whisky and tobacco?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Most certainly they do.

Mr. WEAVER. Was not the interpolation exactly in accordance with the meaning of the platform?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Not when you take the generic sense of the platform. Let me tell you I have helped to write too many platforms not to know how to construe them. I say it is not fair to take a secondary conclusion and interject your own opinion.

Mr. WEAVER. I will ask you if you are in favor of the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am.

Mr. WEAVER. I am not.

Mr. FARQUHAR. When I say that I do not come down to free whisky. There is no man on this side who takes that view. No man here looks for free whisky. But let me tell the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] if he ever does see a Republican House the whisky trusts will be taken care of.

Mr. WEAVER. I have no doubt that side of the House will try to give the people free whisky, and therefore relieve them from the whisky trusts. But why do you not come in and relieve them from the trusts on clothing and the necessaries of life? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. Your want is cheap wages.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Why do you not relieve us from the sugar trusts? We would like to be relieved from those.

Mr. MILLS. I move the committee now rise.

The question was put, and there being doubt as to the result of the vote, a division was called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 112, noes 2.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. BLOUNT) having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill with the Senate amendments, with various recommendations.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 53, 54, 57, 63, 64, 65, 66, 70, 71, 89, 90, 101, 102, 107, 131, 132, 133, 141, 148, 161, 162, 163.

They recommend non-concurrence in the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 28, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 55, 56, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 67, 68, 69, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 103, 104, 105, 106, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, and 171.

Mr. FORNEY. I move the adoption of the report, and ask the previous question on it.

Mr. BURROWS. Has the statement been read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is not a conference report.

The motion of Mr. FORNEY was agreed to, and the report was adopted.

CONTINUING APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a joint resolution (H. Res. 187) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government; which was read a first and second time, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That all appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws which shall remain unprovided for on the 30th day of June, 1888, be, and they are hereby, continued and made available for a period of thirty days from and after that day, unless the regular appropriations therefor provided in bills now pending in Congress shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889; and in case the appropriations, or any of them, hereby continued are or is sufficient to carry on the said necessary operations, a sufficient amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to carry on the same: Provided, That no greater amount shall be expended therefor than will be in the same proportion to the appropriations for the fiscal year 1888 as thirty days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year: Provided further, That authority is also granted for continuing during the same period the necessary work required for public printing and binding and for all other miscellaneous objects embodied in the sundry civil, army, District of Columbia, legislative, executive, and judical, and naval appropriations acts in advance of appropriations to be hereafter made for said objects: And provided further, That all sums expended under this act shall be charged to and be deducted from the appropriations for like service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

Mr. RANDALL. If there be no objection, I now demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF FROM THE CHARGE OF DESERTION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint as conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion, Mr. BOUTELLE, Mr. WISE, and Mr. HERBERT.

TARIFF.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 9051.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted. The Chair will assume that the formal amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I renew the amendment. I renew it not pro forma, but because I desire to have this clause stricken out unless I can have information upon the subject different from what I now possess.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had intended to recognize first the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], but will recognize the gentleman from New Jersey later.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, every instrument, including platforms, must be taken together as a whole, and each section and provision must be construed in the light of every other section and provision, and must be read in the light of the loves, hopes, actions, and history of the party making the platform. By the platform adopted at Chicago I am willing to stand, or by it fall; but I am not willing that a sentence here or there shall be picked out and separated from other sentences and a false construction placed upon it by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] or any other enemy, and that we be compelled to accept such construction. So when the gentleman from Texas says that the platform commits the Republican party to "free whisky," I deny it.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that after the ordinary expenses of the Government are paid for the year 1888 under existing law and appropriation for that year there will still remain in the Treasury of the revenues collected for that year $66,000,000. Now what does the Republican platform pledge the Republican party to do if it comes into power? Amongst other things, it demands appropriations. For what? "For the rebuilding of our Navy." It means such a navy that will command respect at home and abroad, sufficient to strengthen our diplomacy, sufficient to enforce all just demands, either touching the person or property of the citizen. Such a navy, when completed, would cost at least $50,000,000. It also demands appropriations "for the construction of coast fortifications and modern ordnance, and other approved modern means of defense for the protection of our defenseless harbors and cities." Such fortifications, ordnance, and means of defense, when completed, would cost at least $50,000,000 more.

The platform also demands appropriations "for the payment of just pensions to our soldiers." Such appropriation includes not only pensions to all honorably discharged soldiers of the late war who are disabled and dependent upon their labor for a support, but such pledge will not be satisfied until every worthy soldier of the late war is at least placed upon as good a footing as the soldier of the Mexican war; that is, by law placed upon the pension-roll at the age of sixty-two, whether disabled or not, for at least $8 per month. The keeping of this pledge will at least add to the annual expenditure $25,000,000 per annum, and may exceed it. Now, in light of these pledges of appropriation and legislation contained in the Republican platform, listen to the reading of the section touching the reduction of internal and tariff taxation, as follows:

The Republican party would effect all needed reduction of the national revenue by repealing the taxes on tobacco, which are an annoyance and burden to agriculture, and the tax upon spirits used in the arts and for mechanical purposes; and by such revision of the tariff laws as will tend to check imports of such articles as are produced by our people, the production of which gives employment to our labor, and release from import duties those articles of foreign production (except luxuries) the like of which can not be produced at home. If there shall still remain a larger revenue than is requisite for the wants of the Government, we favor the entire repeal of internal taxes rather than the surrender of any part of our protective system at the joint behest of the whisky trusts and the agents of foreign manufacturers.

It says when we can safely reduce taxes. First, take the tax off tobacco, which amounts to $30,000,000 per annum. That is contrary to the President's message, but you Democrats, while you indorsed his message at St. Louis, repeal the tobacco tax by the Mills bill and then indorsed the Mills bill also at St. Louis in your platform. There is consistency for you!

Next, the Republican platform says that if further reduction is necessary the tax shall be taken off "spirits used in the arts and for mechanical purposes;" this would reduce the revenues at least $6,000,000 more per annum. Next, the Republican platform says in substance that the tax shall be taken off articles imported that can not be produced in this country (except luxuries). A fair construction of this provision in the platform will give you over $1 per capita by the removal of the tariff upon sugar, amounting to a decrease of $60,000,000 per annum on that article alone, and this, too, before you touch the internal tax upon spirits.

Now, when all these things are accomplished, amounting to a very large sum of money, if there is still need of further reduction, and we are obliged to choose between attacking the protective system, the wages of labor and the prosperity of the country on the one side, and a reduction of internal-revenue taxation on the other, then, and not till then, after all these things have been accomplished, the Republican party places itself upon record as favoring the further removal of internal taxation rather than to interfere with the wages of labor and the diversity of the industries of the country. That is the position of the platform plainly and truthfully stated. The country will pass judgment upon the platform, in view of all it says, and not upon a distorted representation of a part of what it says by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MILLS. We have given gentlemen on the other side "the last word;" and I think we should now close this debate. I ask for a vote.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to strike out these two lines.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not offer this amendment with the view of engaging in any general discussion. I desire to get back to the bill.

Mr. MILLS. All right.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman must have observed that in all I have said I have always kept to the text of the bill. I deprecate these side excursions as much as the gentleman from Texas can.

Mr. MILLS. Go ahead.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to strike out these two lines; and I do so because, according to my information, chicory root is used for the purpose of adulterating the cheaper kinds of coffee. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means whether it is used for any other purpose.

Mr. MILLS. I do not know of my own knowledge whether it is used for any purpose except to make a drink something like coffee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Chicory root contains no nutriment; it is a fraud; it is used, as I have said, for the purpose of adulterating the cheaper kinds of coffee, which are sold to our laboring classes. This article, instead of being admitted free, should be prohibited. In the very next paragraph I find the bill proposes to put upon the free-list—

Acorns and dandelion root, raw and prepared, and all other articles used or intended to be used as coffee or substitutes therefor, not specially enumerated or provided for.

If members of this House will take the pains to read the proceedings of the different conventions held in Washington from year to year, assembled with the view of securing measures to protect our people against adulterations of their foods and their drink, they would see the necessity of raising the bars higher against this class of frauds rather than lowering them. If chicory is used for any other purpose than I have stated, if it is used for any useful purpose, let that class of chicory be excepted and put upon the free-list; but let us not admit free this article which comes in as a fraud, which as chicory root sells for 6 or 7 cents a pound, but which, after being mixed with coffee, is sold at coffee prices to persons who think they are buying coffee. Let us do what we can to prohibit such business. For the reasons I have stated I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MILLS. Chicory root is used as a coffee substitute now, when there is a duty upon it; it will still be used as a coffee substitute after the duty is taken off—but the poorer class of people, who can not afford to pay the higher prices for pure coffee, will, when this duty is removed, get the substitute a little cheaper than now.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But the substitute is worthless to them, and they are cheated in buying it. They think they are buying coffee.

Mr. MILLS. That is their business, not mine.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This article of adulteration is sold as coffee at coffee prices; it is not a substitute; chicory is a cheat, a fraud, a delusion, a snare—an incarnate lie.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. KELLEY. I renew the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise. I gave notice of this motion a short time ago.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say a word on the merits of this amendment.

Mr. MILLS. Well, I yield to the gentleman. When he has concluded I will ask for a vote.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have for many years endeavored to ascertain any other use to which chicory is applied than as a substitute for coffee; I have never been able to learn one.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is not a substitute; it is a fraud.

Mr. KELLEY. It is not sold raw; it is sold burned or browned and ground. In every package which the poor people buy of what they believe to be browned coffee chicory is a chief ingredient. It has not the qualities of coffee. Among epicures, I believe, it is supposed to soften the harsh flavor of very green coffee; but the use of this article, so far as concerns the mass of the people, has the effect of depriving them of that which they suppose they are buying for use at the morning meal to invigorate them for their work. This article, as the gentleman from New Jersey has suggested, is a sheer fraud; there is no pretense that it is anything else. You require oleomargarine to be sold by its name, and such a requirement is proper; yet you propose now to offer a bonus for fraudulently adulterating all the coffee consumed by the poor, by means of an article which is not at all kindred to coffee.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 60, noes 80.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask that we now recur to the amendment which was passed informally in regard to German looking-glass plates.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 132, insert:
"German looking-glass plates, made of blown glass, silvered."

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a remark or two on this subject. In the first place, I have here a letter from a glass manufacturing establishment in my district, not only protesting against the reduction of the duty on this article, but asking for an increased duty. These gentlemen say:

We ask an increase on silvered glass, because enormous quantities of silvered German plate are annually imported at such a figure that they can not be manufactured here on account of the low duty placed upon them. Besides, they also keep out of the market a similar quantity of silvered plate-glass of home manufacture.

As admitted by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD], the blown glass polished, which when 24 by 60 inches square, is to pay a duty of 15 cents a square foot, and all above that 25 cents a square foot, is a very high order of glass—a quality next to plate-glass—the difference between it and plate-glass being that the plate-glass is somewhat thicker; but for looking-glass purposes this blown glass polished is as good as, if not better than, plate-glass, because it is much lighter. It answers every purpose of plate-glass for looking-glass purposes.

I am told in Germany this glass is blown, and after having been blown and made flat is handed over to poor women who take it to their homes and polish it and silver it; and these women work for from 20 to 30 cents a day.

I am told, moreover, that the expense of silvering is trifling compared with the value of the glass, and if this proposition goes into the bill a large quantity would be imported for looking-glass purposes. When imported the silver could be easily removed and the glass could then be used for ordinary purposes.

Mr. Chairman, the bill provides that polished cylinder and plate-glass of certain dimensions shall pay certain duties, and when the dimensions are greater the duty is increased.

If this proposition be admitted into the bill silvered glass of all sizes and thicknesses can be imported into the United States free of duty, and if such glass be desirable for looking-glass purposes the silver can be left on; but if it may be desired for other uses the silver can be removed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask for five minutes more to explain this.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, it must be perfectly evident to everybody if the silver can be removed and their glass can be used as a substitute for plate-glass, it will drive out to a very great extent the home product, and to how great an extent no man can tell. It will supplant, in all probability, both the plate-glass and ordinary window-glass.

That must be plain to everybody. If the cost of polishing and silvering be trifling, such inevitably must be the result.

Are the gentlemen who prepared this bill willing a proposition shall be inserted which is susceptible of such an abuse? Are they willing the plate-glass establishment in Missouri, the plate-glass establishment in Indiana, the plate-glass establishments in Pennsylvania, and the ordinary establishments in all these States and in New Jersey, Ohio, and elsewhere shall have their business cut off by the introduction into this bill of a proposition susceptible of such abuse?

Is any gentleman on that side of the House prepared to say it is not a practicable matter? Is any gentleman prepared to say that glass silvered and polished when brought into the country can not be used for other than looking-glass purposes? If you are not prepared to say that, you ought not to embrace in this bill such a proposition. It should not be done in reference to any glass. When you make other descriptions of glass pay a graded duty, why should you incorporate into the bill a feature which would drive out of use both the higher and the lower grades of glass to an extent which no man can foresee?

Gentlemen, I consider this is a proposition fraught with serious peril to the glass industries of the country. I trust it will be voted down. If it is not voted down it should be amended to make it clear.

In addition to that, there is not a single thing which the American manufacturer of glass can not supply. He can make all the glass needed for the furniture men in Chicago and elsewhere. I understand we are able to produce any quantity or quality required.

It seems because there is a large furniture establishment in a Democratic district represented by the gentleman from Michigan, and because that establishment wants this glass to come in free for its uses, there is to be a discrimination, while every man else throughout the country, the man who builds a house through whose windows God's sunlight streams upon a humble repast——

A MEMBER. What is that?

Mr. BAYNE. I use the language of J. Randolph Tucker. I say every man, however poor, is obliged to pay a duty of 15 cents a square foot if he imports the glass for such a house, and if he imports larger panes for his parlor, 25 cents a square foot. But the big furniture establishments are to get theirs in free.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I am somewhat surprised to find from the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he seems to be laboring under a singular misapprehension with regard to this whole question, and particularly so as he comes from a State which manufactures annually in the neighborhood of from two and a half to three million dollars' worth of glass.

The object sought to be attained by the amendment now pending is to put a certain class of looking-glass plates upon the free-list. And if this amendment prevails it will not interfere with a single glass manufacturer in the United States, and I believe I can demonstrate that proposition to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Pennsylvania before I conclude.

This amendment has been solicited by the furniture manufacturers of the United States, not, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to suppose, the manufacturers from a Democratic district or any other district of the State of Michigan; and if I mistake not—I will not be positive on this point, but I have an impression that there is a concern engaged in the manufacture of furniture in the city of Pittsburgh whose name appears appended to the memorial presented to this House asking the adoption of the amendment now before the committee.

These manufacturers are not all of one political faith. Many of them are Republicans and believe in the system of taxation advocated by gentlemen on the other side of the House.

For about fifteen years we have had a duty on German looking-glass plates, the object being, as we have been informed, to encourage this branch of manufacture in the United States. But the effort has not met with success, for during that whole period not one foot of this glass has been manufactured here, and it must be remembered that it is not the price of the glass which interferes, but because nature has not specially fitted our country for this industry, and there are natural conditions which prevail to such an extent that this character of glass can not be manufactured here. It is not the price of labor that prohibits it. It is prevented from entirely different causes. And I do not believe any amount of tariff would have the effect to establish the manufacture of these plates here.

Mr. Chairman, the German looking-glass plates to which the amendment refers are highly polished glass plates, utterly unfit for ordinary use. They are only used in mirrors. In order to produce a fine mirror a cheap plate of glass can not be used, and for the reason that the moment you put the quicksilver upon the back of the glass every defect in the glass is at once developed.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to fear that if German looking-glass plates were put upon the free-list the silver on the back might be scraped off and the glass used for domestic purposes as ordinary window-glass, coming in competition with window-glass manufactured in the United States. Why, Mr. Chairman, that idea will scarcely be pressed, I imagine. It is not worthy of consideration. The amount of silver is exceedingly small on a plate of glass. Take, for instance, an ordinary German looking-glass plate of the average size, say 30 by 24 inches. The price paid in the city of New York, including the duty, is $3.02; deducting the tariff, which would be about 50 cents, it would leave the price of the glass plate a little over $2.50 each if there were no tariff on them. Now, let us assume that the silver is scraped off. That will add an expense of from 15 to 25 cents, probably. Put it at 25 cents, and it would leave the cost of the glass plate $2.25. What is the market value of an American window-glass of that size to-day? It is exactly 47 cents. It is manifest, therefore, that there can be no competition in this respect.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HIRES. Mr. Chairman, I understand the object of this amendment, although I was not present when it was read, is to permit the introduction of German silver looking-glass plates free of duty. I would like to call attention to the fact that under the operation of the present law all cylinder and ground glass, polished, not exceeding 10 by 15 inches square, pays a duty of 2½ cents per square foot, and all glass above that, and not exceeding 16 by 24 inches, pays 4 cents a square foot.

This is the identical glass which is termed looking-glass plates; and if I am correctly informed the moment you remove the duty from this kind of glass it will be imported free of duty and will be the substitute for the American plate-glass which is now being largely made in this country; and also of the American manufacture of blown glass. I will admit there is a great difference in the price, as my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORD] says; but notwithstanding the price, the superior quality of this glass, which, when it is polished, is the finest glass made, would cause it to be largely substituted for our own American glass.

Mr. FORD. Does the gentleman mean window glass?

Mr. HIRES. Yes.

Mr. FORD. Do you suppose a man who could buy window glass for 47 cents would discard it and pay $2.50?

Mr. HIRES. I will only say as a dealer in this article that oftentimes people will get quotations, and where the difference is no greater than it would be here they would take this polished cylinder glass in preference to American double-thick. Not but what the price is greater, but that the difference in quality would be an inducement to use that kind of glass.

I think, Mr. Chairman, this amendment if passed would be very detrimental to the manufacturer and also to the honest importer. I sincerely hope it will not pass.

The Chair put the question on the amendment, and was in doubt as to the result.

Mr. BAYNE. I call for a division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 62, noes 31.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I have received a couple of telegrams calling my attention to certain articles, which I wish to add at this point—pressed and ornamental brick. I wish to know if I can offer an amendment at this time? There was a similar amendment made yesterday to embrace several kinds of brick. I now want to move an amendment at the end of line 132 to that effect, in the same place where the present amendment occurs.

Mr. MILLS. We have passed that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The line has been passed.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Then I ask unanimous consent to return to that line.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Acorns and dandelion root, raw or prepared, and all other articles used, or intended to be used, as coffee or substitutes therefor, not specially enumerated or provided for.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that paragraph. I do it for the reasons which I stated as applying to the preceding paragraph. I will only say in addition to what I said then that here the fraud becomes still more apparent. I would ask any member of this House if he ever knew a person to go to a grocery store and ask for a pound of acorns. I would ask any member of this House if any groceryman ever sold acorns as acorns; if he ever sold dandelion root mixed with coffee as anything but pure coffee. These things are not substitutes for coffee; they are frauds on coffee and frauds on the coffee buyers. The amendment by which I attempted to strike out the other fraud was rejected by a unanimous vote upon the other side against striking it out and a unanimous vote on this side in favor of striking it out.

Now, I want to know whether the gentlemen upon the other side can afford to stand up here with united front and say to the buyers of coffee in this country: "Sirs, we will allow these gentlemen who adulterate the article which you buy as coffee and at coffee prices the free run of the American market." Instead of putting these adulterations on the free-list they should be prohibited or put at such a high rate of duty as would be practical prohibition. If this has not been done in the past it ought to be done now. Talk about these being substitutes for coffee; they are never sold for anything but coffee. It may be the bill is consistent in putting these things upon the free-list. It may be that the operation of this bill if it became a law would be such as to reduce the American laborer to the dire alternative of drinking a decoction of acorns and dandelions or living upon acorn-juice instead of taking healthful and nutritious coffee.

But I want to say to the gentlemen on the other side that this bill in the shape it stands will not become a law. Thank God, if American industries can not be protected in one end of this Capitol they will receive protection at the other end. The American workman asks for coffee; you offer him acorn-juice and dandelion-root soup; but, sirs, he spurns your offer and will insist upon having his coffee.

To return to the exact proposition before us, here is a proposition to favor the introduction into this country of substitutes for coffee which are never sold as substitutes, but are sold as coffee and at coffee rates. It ought to be struck out.

Mr. MILLS. I call for a vote.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR rose.

The CHAIRMAN. If no one desires to oppose the amendment the Chair will have to recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, since the line concerning brick was passed——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman offer a pro forma amendment?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Yes, I move to strike out the last word.

Since the line concerning brick was passed I have received two telegrams from the city of Zanesville, Ohio, 25 miles from where I reside, calling my attention to the fact that there are in that city two firms—and I know both of them very well, and have dealt with both of them—who are engaged in manufacturing and shipping brick.

They ship largely to the North and Northwest, where they would come in competition with Canada brick in case brick are placed on the free-list. They manufacture the best quality of pressed, ornamental, and front brick, and are entitled to some consideration at your hands. They manufacture 30,000,000 brick a year, worth at the place where they are manufactured $200,000.

These two firms, T. B. Townsend & Co. and W. B. Harris & Bro., have built up this large industry, which now yields an annual product of $200,000 a year, at great expense, and should not be subjected to a foreign competition which may destroy some of their best markets, especially those bordering on Canada, where cheaper labor can be had.

This $200,000 is substantially all labor. As the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] stated last evening, the manufacture of brick is mainly done by hand labor. Very little machinery is used. The only material of any considerable value is pure clay. Hence this $200,000 is substantially all labor, and you can estimate for yourselves how many persons are probably employed in a business like this which amounts to $200,000 a year. They make pressed and ornamental brick, and sell them at Cleveland, Toledo, Chicago, and other Northwestern cities. I remember very well that when this business was first started they negotiated with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for cheap freights.

They said it was a new business, a mere experiment; there was no considerable demand for this kind of brick in Zanesville, and hence when they entered into the business they expected to ship their brick to distant cities, and they secured an arrangement by which they got very cheap freights for the first year or two. They have in this way built up an immense business, and are now making thirty million brick a year, and of course they have a large amount of money invested in their business. They manufacture the very best quality of expensive brick, and many of the largest and best blocks in Toledo, Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and other cities are built of Zanesville brick.

These brick are widely known in the market as being of good quality; but if this bill should become a law the industry would be stricken down, because they could not make and sell their brick on the Canadian border in competition with brick made on the other side of the line, where labor costs not more than one-half or two-thirds as much as it does in Ohio. And, in this connection, I wish to say a word in reply to a remark made last evening, to the effect that the Western brick-yards do not pay as much wages as are paid for other kinds of labor.

In my town, in my county, in my district, and wherever I have known brick to be made in Ohio, the brick-yards pay the same wages that are paid in other like kinds of work. I can not understand why a man would consent to go into a brick-yard and work for one-half or two-thirds of the compensation that he would get in some other similar kind of work, and I think the gentleman who made the statement was mistaken. Let me add, that where I live machines are not employed in this business to any considerable extent. The work is done by hand, and there are thousands of men in Ohio engaged in making brick, and I can not understand why they are not as much entitled to protection as any other class of men; but they will not be protected in case this bill becomes a law.

The manufacture of the best quality of pressed, ornamental, and other front brick which has grown up in this country to such large proportions, should not be imperiled by opening the doors of importation as is done by this bill. It means to destroy this industry in some localities, and to endanger it in others; it means to turn thousands of men out of employment, to send large sums of money out of the country for no other purpose than to let foreigners import into this country free of duty. This amendment has already been voted down as is every amendment made by this side, but I desired to present these facts.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. MILLS. Does the gentleman withdraw that amendment?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No, I do not. Of course I do not withdraw it.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 47, noes 63.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cocoa prepared or manufactured

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I desired a while ago to obtain the floor to answer the gentleman from Texas, and I now move to strike out the line which the Clerk has just read. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] accused this side of the House of being in favor of free whisky.

Mr. MILLS rose.

Mr. KERR (to Mr. MILLS). Do you wish to say anything?

Mr. MILLS. I simply wish to remark that what I said was that your party was in favor of freeing whisky of the internal-revenue tax.

Mr. KERR. That is a different proposition.

Mr. MILLS. That is what I said at the time.

Mr. KERR. Oh, no. I am very glad that you have made the modification.

Mr. MILLS. That is what I said all the time, and I referred to your platform.

Mr. KERR. If that is the gentleman's position, I am willing to concede that his statement is true in so far as I am concerned. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not believe that this Government can safely pursue a policy that was repudiated by the great fathers of the Republican party and by the early Democratic party of this country. I believe that all the taxes necessary to carry on our Government economically administered can be raised by a revenue tariff so adjusted as to afford protection to every American industry. That was the position of the Republican party in 1860, and that is the position of the Republican party to-day. The Democratic party held that position until this Congress, and in 1884 they declared that sufficient revenue to carry on the Government economically administered, including pensions and interest and principal of the public debt, could be raised by such a tariff. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY], who was on that platform committee in 1884, made the statement in this House on the 24th of last April that that proposition adopted at Chicago was understood to leave no room for the internal system of taxation in this Government, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] upon this floor has emphasized that position.

That is the position of the Democratic party of North Carolina as repeated in all of its State platforms for years, and it is the position of every Democrat who stands by the early teachers of his party. Now, Mr. Chairman, the first divergence from that theory was by the present President of the United States, who was elected upon that platform, and who declared at the opening of this session that no one was in favor of repealing any portion of the internal-revenue taxes.

That position has been indorsed by the Democratic party. The Mills bill, which repudiates that position and takes the tax off tobacco, has been indorsed. In addition to that, they indorse the position of the party in 1884, which repudiates both positions, and embodies what I now assert to be the true position.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KERR. I would like two or three minutes more.

Mr. MILLS. I hope we shall adjourn this political discussion.

Mr. KERR. If I can be allowed two or three minutes more I shall be done with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to occupy two minutes.

Mr. MILLS. I take the floor and yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] was the leading exponent of the prohibition sentiment of our State ten years ago, and as a man in favor of that sentiment I sympathized with that gentleman when he was at that time a leading candidate for governor. Unfortunately for the party—possibly unfortunately for the gentleman, though I do not know as to that—the majority of the people of my State did not agree with that portion of the people who wanted to make him governor, and since that time he has not been with us upon that question. [Laughter on the Republican side.] He stands up here to-day against the unanimous sentiment of the Prohibitionists of this country, repudiating the doctrine that they have asserted North and South, in favor of divorcing the Government from this system of taxation which seeks to make permanent in our Government a policy which puts the main portion of the tax upon the poor people, who are least able to pay it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WEAVER. If my colleague [Mr. KERR] will give me his attention, I want to ask him a question or two.

Mr. KERR. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER. Do you stand on the Republican platform of 1888 or the Prohibition platform of 1888?

Mr. KERR. I stand on the Prohibition platform and the Republican platform, both. [Laughter and applause.] They are identical.

Mr. WEAVER. Behold the Colossus of Rhodes! [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. I now ask for a vote. I must appeal to gentlemen to stop making party speeches.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. VANDEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out lines 141 and 142, which read as follows:

Cocoa, prepared or manufactured.
Dates, plums, and prunes.

The CHAIRMAN. Line 142 has not yet been reached.

Mr. VANDEVER. Then I move to strike out line 141.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is now pending.

Mr. VANDEVER. I move, then, pro forma, to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the cocoa bean is, as I understand, a product of South America. The present duty upon it is 2 cents a pound. When imported it is the basis of a growing manufacture. In the part of the country from which I come the cocoa bean is coming into very considerable use in the manufacture of chocolate. I do not understand, therefore, the propriety of putting the manufactured products of cocoa upon the free-list. If this proposition be persisted in, the manufacture of such products in this country—an industry which, as I have said, is of growing importance on the Pacific coast, and I think especially in the district of my colleague in front of me—will be entirely and irreparably broken down.

This branch of industry now gives employment to a considerable amount of capital and a large number of persons on the Pacific coast. The rates of freight, as a matter of course, enter into this question. The raw product being manufactured upon the Pacific side, the heavy railroad freights are escaped, and thus great advantage is enjoyed in the supply of that product to our portion of the country. I suggest to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and to the Committee of the Whole whether under existing circumstances it would not be just to except the manufactured article from the operation of this clause of the free-list.

The value of the import of cocoa bean into this country is put down at $126,543; the duty collected is $9,020. Here is a feeble industry just coming into importance, struggling for life. It may employ ultimately a large amount of American capital and American labor. It will be no detriment to the revenue to admit the crude cocoa free, and no detriment to the public interest to continue the duty upon the manufactured article.

On the Pacific coast, as everywhere else, people are affected very much by their private interests. Touch a man's pocket and you are very apt to touch his judgment. I think our friends on the other side have had recently a practical illustration of this matter in the election in Oregon. The pending bill struck a blow at some of the most important industries of that State. The people of Oregon recognized this measure as affecting injuriously their interests. What was the result? A verdict against the Democratic party, which may have carried some little consternation into their camp. I would remark to the chairman of the committee in connection with this item, and other items which affect in a very material degree the interests of California, that if they be persisted in California will follow in the same direction in the approaching November election.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. Let us have a vote on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] has moved to strike out line 141. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. VANDEVER] desire to submit a substantial amendment?

Mr. VANDEVER. I move to amend by striking out in line 141 the words "prepared or manufactured."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. VANDEVER, it was rejected, there being—ayes 47, noes 55.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] to strike out the whole line.

Mr. KERR. I withdraw that motion.

The Clerk read the next line, as follows:

Dates, plums, and prunes.

Mr. MILLS. I move to strike out the words "plums and prunes."

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Currants, Zante or other.
Figs.

Mr. MCKENNA. I move to strike out the line just read, "figs." Mr. Chairman, I would not have much hope of carrying this amendment if the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means had not voluntarily moved a moment ago to strike out "plums and prunes." I do not see any legislative or economic distinction between plums and prunes on the one hand and figs on the other. The gentleman's action has "set me up in hope."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Whose district do the figs grow in?

Mr. MCKENNA. The isothermal line mentioned by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], in its various course touching a Republican and Democratic district and discriminating products by politics, ought not to apply to this case. I am left in confusion and puzzled to know how discrimination against figs can be justified. I am inclined to think the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will urge the Democratic members of the House to vote for this amendment.

There is no reason under the sun, and no Democrat and nobody else, be he from California or be he from Texas, can explain why prunes and plums should be struck from the free-list and figs retained upon the free-list. They are all three California industries; three young California industries. Figs to-day are so cheap it is clear that their price is little affected by the tariff. It scarcely pays now in the State of California to dry the black figs. We are resorting, with great success, to the white Smyrna fig. If Congress will stop meddling, if it will keep off its hands for a little while, we will develop the industry to a great success. I hope the gentleman will recommend to his side of the House to vote for this amendment.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Chairman, I indorse what has been said by my colleague who has just taken his seat. I desire to congratulate the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the constituency I represent for putting prunes and plums where they ought to be—on the tariff-list. I can assure him it is a wise measure. It will not be many years when what is now a luxury will be produced in such quantities as to supply everybody at a reasonable rate, and will no longer need any protection.

But I did not rise for the purpose of discussing this matter, but for another purpose. I have attempted on two or three occasions to submit resolutions passed by the State board of horticulture of California, and requesting their being printed in the RECORD, but I have invariably run against some one of the rules and miserably failed. I now submit them as a part of my remarks, as they are germane to the item under discussion, and I understand I have the right.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the gentleman's right.

Mr. FELTON. I submit these resolutions, and ask for them the attention of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolutions of State Board of Horticulture of California.

Whereas there are $20,000,000 invested in fruit culture in this State; and
Whereas this may indefinitely increase if given the proper conditions; and
Whereas the white scale bug (Icerya purchasi) threatens the very existence of the citrus fruits in this State, as well as numbers of other fruit trees; and
Whereas it stands to reason that there are parasites for these different scale bugs in the places of their nativity: Therefore,
Be it resolved by the Fruit Growers of California in convention assembled, That the United States Congress be petitioned for an appropriation of not less than $50,000, to be used by the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of sending experts to those countries where the baneful insects are known to have originated, to discover if possible their natural enemies, the parasites, and introduce them to this country; also, that the Department of Agriculture be enabled to make actual experiments here in the field to, if possible, overcome these injurious insects, etc.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I do not know whether there is a trust controlling the fruit market or not, but I ask the Clerk to read this morceau which I have clipped from the Critic of this city.

The Clerk read as follows:

Twelve thousand crates of the choicest Southern fruits were dumped into the Atlantic outside of Sandy Hook last week to prevent breaking down prices in the New York markets. With as many people going hungry as there are in New York, this sort of thing should be permitted to occur only once.

[Laughter.]

The question recurred on Mr. MCKENNA's amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Meats, game, and poultry.

Mr. WEBER. I move to strike out that line 145. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know the amount of revenue put into the Treasury on the importation of the items embraced in line 145.

A MEMBER. One hundred and ten thousand dollars.

Mr. WEBER. Whatever the amount may be it is purely a tribute paid by the Canadians for trading in our markets. It will not affect the price of meat in our market a particle. It will fall into that category of articles some of which we have passed in this bill whose importation into this country is so insignificant compared with the amounts consumed that the price is not affected. The fact of placing this item on the free-list will be simply to enhance the prosperity of our Canadian friends without benefiting the consumers in any degree whatever on our side.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that before this is voted upon, and I have no desire to occupy any of the time of the committee, that some reasons will be given by the other side for the action the committee have taken in placing this item upon the free-list; and I will not occupy the floor at present for the time allotted to me under the rule, but ask that a reason be given as to the propriety of the action sought to be taken here by the committee.

Mr. MILLS. I will give the gentleman a reason that I think will be satisfactory. In the first place it is admitted on all hands that we have got to reduce taxation to some extent; and in the second place, acting in that view, we thought it better to reduce that taxation upon meats, upon the absolute necessaries of life, and things of that character, rather than upon other articles which are to a certain extent not so necessary; and consequently we put meat, game, and poultry upon the free-list in order to cheapen the food of the people of this country.

Now I ask a vote.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WEBER, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

146. Milk, fresh.

Mr. LYMAN. I move to strike out that line.

Mr. Chairman, I have thus far taken no part in the debate upon the pending bill. The manufacturing industries of the district which I represent are yet in their youngest infancy, and I do not assume to be as well informed upon the details of what is a just protective tariff on articles the product of the various manufactories which our people (and by that I mean the people of the United States) are endeavoring to build up; and hence, I have left the discussion of those details to gentlemen upon this floor who represent districts where these manufactories are situated, and who are better, much better, qualified than I to cast light upon those items of the bill now pending.

The district I have the honor to represent on this floor is largely, and, indeed, almost exclusively agricultural, and a large majority of my constituents are farmers. In my course upon the tariff I endeavor to divest myself of all purely local prejudices and interests, and to act in a way to best promote the material interests of our entire country and enhance the prosperity and happiness of all the people of the United States, whether they live upon the Atlantic seaboard, in the new South, in the great Mississippi Valley, among the Rocky Mountains, or upon the golden Pacific coast. I am in favor of the protection of American industries and American labor from principle, and not for the purpose of aiding the local interests of my own district alone. But by so doing I believe I am, in the best and strongest manner possible, advocating and advancing the interests of the farmers of my section. What my people want is the best market for the products of the soil they can possibly get, and, too, they want that market at the very shortest possible distance from their own doors. I shall be rejoiced if it shall be vouchsafed to me to live long enough to see a manufacturing establishment planted in every township in the fertile Ninth district of Iowa, as well as in every township of that great agricultural State, of which its sons are all proud.

I would like to see these hives of industry planted and flourishing, with their dozens, scores, and hundreds of happy, well-paid, prosperous operatives, there to buy and eat the product of the fertile acres around them, and not subject to the free competition of Canada and other foreign countries. I want to see a market at the very doors of the farmers of Iowa, in order that they may save the immense cost of transportation to which they are now subjected, the waste and loss of transportation, the commissions of middlemen, and all annoyances and cost of reaching the "markets of the world." Hence, I say, I believe that if I were not a protectionist for protection's sake, my present position on this bill would but represent the local interests of my immediate constituents. I say, all hail to the day when these things shall be. But I am bound to say that if Democratic principles and methods are to continue to prevail in this country, neither I nor the youngest gentleman on this floor can hope to live to see it.

But we are now considering a portion of the bill which makes a direct attack upon the farmers of my section and upon the farmers of this entire country. It is proposed by the Mills bill now under consideration to retain a tariff upon, and to protect sugar, rice, and other products of the soil of limited and local production only, and which can never be produced in our country in sufficient quantity to meet the demands of our people, they being articles of universal consumption by the masses of our country, and to place upon the free-list those articles the product of agricultural industry of almost universal production, and of which we may produce a surplus and be in great want of a market for.

In 1884 the people of this country made a lamentable mistake when they put the Democratic party in power. They are fast waking up to that error. The awakening began to manifest itself in Oregon a few days ago, out on the Pacific, and it will roll on and on, until in November next it will reach the Atlantic and the Gulf, and the real and true friends of the people, of free, independent government will be again at the helm.

It is claimed that one of the objects of this bill is to reduce the surplus in the Treasury. It will not do it. It provides for a tariff for revenue, and our revenues thereunder will be increased. However, the surplus does not worry me greatly. When we pay our just debts, and provide for our dependent veteran soldiers as humanity, honor, and justice demand we shall have no surplus.

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

Mr. MCKENNA was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. LYMAN, who resumed and concluded his remarks as above.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Egg yelks.
Beans, pease, and split pease.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, on this side of the House we have repeatedly charged that this bill is framed in the interest of foreign nations, and that it would work great injury to our own people. We have asked, as we have passed over article by article and section by section of this bill, that gentlemen upon the other side would give us some reason why the various articles were placed upon the free-list. Our inquiries have as a rule met with no satisfactory response, and in most cases no reason has been attempted to be given, and the other side have acted as if none can be given. I think myself that no good reason can be given.

But, Mr. Chairman, I think there is a reason for the introduction of this bill not avowed by its advocates. I avail myself of this opportunity to tell you what seems to me to be one of the reasons why the passage of this bill is urged in its present form, and so far as I have noticed it is one to which the attention of the country and the House has not been as yet directed. I do not claim any originality in the discovery; but it has not been called to the attention of the committee, and possibly not to the people of the country for a reason which I will try to make manifest. We had some time since a distinguished body sitting in this city engaged in negotiating a fishery treaty between this country and our neighbors governing the country on our Northern boundary.

I have here before me the official report made by one of the members of that commission, Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, who represented Canada and Her Britannic Majesty on that conference. The report was made in the House of Commons of the Canadian Parliament, and will be found in the House of Commons debates, second session Sixth Parliament, 51 Vic., of 10th of April, 1888. Sir Charles is evidently undertaking to explain to the Canadian people that whilst he had given the United States something in the treaty that was negotiated with our country, he wanted to call their attention to the much more valuable things which they had secured in return for it. And whilst, Mr. Chairman, we do not think he gave away anything that properly belonged to Canada and Great Britain, and that on the face of the treaty it is unjust to the United States, and concedes little or nothing that is not ours by right, yet I want to call the attention of the House and the country to what is now apparent, that this treaty was agreed to because the representatives of the British Government have had some private understanding with the Democratic majority in this House in regard to legislation to be hereafter had in Congress in the interest of Canada; that the small concessions made to the rights of our people in that treaty were obtained through promises from Americans that something that would be of great advantage to the Dominion of Canada on our north should be done by the Congress of the United States. This is at least one of the reasons why the industries of our country are being attacked by the Mills bill. As an argument for this free-trade bill we have been often told in this debate that tariff duties are a tax on the people of the country laying the tariff; that our tariff duties are paid by the people of this country exclusively. Sir Charles Tupper does not so understand it, and I propose to have read now from his official report made in Parliament on the 10th day of April, 1888, and the House can then judge for itself as to the meaning of his remarks, and also whether the Democratic Administration has not been promising Canada free trade.

After he had stated to the House of Commons that his arguments would no doubt be used against the treaty and quoted against him in the Senate of the United States, he goes on to say:

The only way we Canadians can obtain any benefits from the reciprocal relations with the United States is by legislation.

I read from pages 11, 21, and 22. Speaking of the non-intercourse act of our Congress, he says:

That expressed the sentiments and the feeling in the United States of America, and our friends the plenipotentiaries representing the United States, said: "If we make a treaty with you affecting the tariff, however small the inducement you might be willing to accept, it is certain of absolute rejection by the Senate, because the Congress of the United States have stated their position firmly, and they will not permit any interference on the part of the Administration of the United States by treaty with anything that involves a change in fiscal laws of the United States."

It will be observed that Sir Charles is very cautious in making public the promises he had received, but he continues:

Now, sir, I am in somewhat a similar position in explaining this treaty, which I have now reached, to that in which I was in 1871 when defending the treaty of my right honorable friend under somewhat different circumstances. Then he said: "Every word that you force us to say in support of this treaty will be used against us at Halifax in diminution of the payment that we are entitled to for the greater value of our fisheries." To-day I am in a somewhat similar position. For every word that I say in defense of the treaty to which I have put my hand and to which I ask the sanction of this House with the utmost confidence, every word that I say in support of it may be used to-morrow in the Senate of the United States, where support to the treaty may be more difficult to obtain than it is in the House of Commons of Canada.

The House will therefore understand that on this occasion it can not be expected from me that I shall point out very elaborately the advantages accruing to Canada under the treaty to which we have placed our hands. What I say is this: I say, sir, that the course that has been adopted in reference to this treaty has been adopted with a view to secure in the only way that was found practicable the best interests of Canada.

* * * * * * *

As I have already informed the House, the plenipotentiaries of the United States stated they were quite unable to put anything in the treaty that would necessarily touch the fiscal policy of their country. They said that to do so would be simply to invite rejection of the treaty on the ground that they had infringed the jurisdiction which Congress possessed, the United States Congress having, as I have shown the House, adopted, in the most emphatic form, the policy not to allow any changes in their tariff except by the act of Congress itself.

We therefore put this in the contingent clause. We provide absolutely for the concessions that have been made with reference to delimitation, and with reference to the treatment of United States fishing vessels, when compelled to resort to our ports in distress or in need of casual supplies or for a homeward voyage. All these were made absolute by the treaty; but when it came to that which is of great value to the United States fishermen, when it came to that which enables the United States fishermen to make Canada a basis of supplies for the purpose of better competing with our own fishermen, we then felt that we had a right to take our stand, and if Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries have not been able to support the extreme contention of the Canadian Government, honorable gentlemen will find that, on the other hand, the plenipotentiaries of the United States, who had, as a matter of diplomatic intercourse, taken a very strong ground as to the indefeasible rights of American fishing vessels to obtain in our ports as commercial vessels whatever supplies they required for carrying on their fishing—to be able to purchase bait, to be able to purchase supplies of every kind, and to be able to transship their fish—they will find that our friends on the other side had, in the same way, to concede a great deal as compared with the extreme contention that they had made.

Here it is provided, as a just and proper security to the interests of the fishermen of Canada, who have the right, while excluded by heavy duties from the markets of the United States, to such protection as the treaty of 1818 has provided for them, that whenever a question arises as to Canada being made the basis of supply for the American deep-sea fishing vessels—because the question of fishing is not in controversy at all, the Americans having given up the right to catch fish in the inshore waters of Canada—that only can be done for a sufficient quid pro quo. We have, therefore, provided in article 15:

"When the United States shall remove the duty from fish-oil, whale-oil, seal-oil, and fish of all kinds (except fish preserved in oil), being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of Canada and of Newfoundland, including Labrador, as well as from the usual and necessary casks, barrels, kegs, cans, and other usual necessary coverings containing the products above mentioned, the like products, being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of the United States, as well as the usual and necessary coverings of the same, as above described, shall be admitted free of duty into the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland."

And upon such removal of duties, and while the aforesaid articles are allowed to be brought into the United States by British subjects, without duty being reimposed thereon, the privilege of entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the aforesaid coasts of Canada and of Newfoundland shall be accorded to United States fishing vessels by annual licenses, free of charge, for the following purposes, namely:

"1. The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits.

"2. Transshipment of catch, for transport by any means of conveyance.

"3. Shipping of crews.

"Supplies shall not be obtained by barter, but bait may be so obtained.

"The like privileges shall be continued or given to fishing vessels of Canada and of Newfoundland on the Atlantic coasts of the United States."

I think that is a measure which will meet with the hearty approval of the House. I think that will be regarded as a fair and reasonable proposition, that if fishing vessels of the United States are allowed to make Canada a base for obtaining their supplies and furnishing all the materials necessary for the outfit of a fishing voyage, for the transshipment of their catch, and making our harbors and ports the means of carrying on their industry, the fishermen of Canada, with whom they are in that case better able to compete than they could otherwise, are entitled to have their fish entered free in the ports of the United States.

While the plenipotentiaries of the United States were not able to make this an absolute provision, I do not hesitate to say that I look confidently to the period in the not remote future when fish will be made free and the fishermen of the United States will be able to obtain all the advantages in our ports which are here given to them. I hold we have accomplished that without injuring in the slightest degree the fisheries of Canada, without injuring Canadian interests to any extent whatever. We have made concessions, as I have said, but we have made them with the avowed object of placing all our people, not only the fishermen, but the agriculturist, the lumberman, every man in this country, in a better relation with the United States than he was before. What is the result?

As I have said, Mr. Bayard told us, the American plenipotentiaries told us that there was but one way of obtaining what we wished. "You want greater freedom of commercial intercourse. You want relaxation in our tariff arrangements with respect to natural products in which you are so rich and abundant. There is but one way to obtain it. Let us by common concession be able to meet on common ground and remove this irritating cause of difficulty between the two countries out of the way, and you will find that the policy of this Government, the policy of the President and of the House of Representatives, the policy of the great Democratic party of the United States, will at once take an onward march in the direction you propose, and accomplish steadily that which you would desire, is the only way by which it can ever be attained."

Those were not empty words, those were the sober utterances of distinguished statesmen who pointed to the avowed policy of the Government of the United States as the best evidence of the sincerity of what they said. What has happened already? Already we have action by the financial exponent of the Administration of the United States, I mean Mr. MILLS—the gentleman who in the United States Congress represents the Government of the day, and stands in the position most analogous in the United States to the finance minister in this house, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who propounds the policy of the Administration in the House.

How is he selected? The Democratic party sustaining the Government selects a man as Speaker of the House of Representatives who is in accord with the policy of the Administration for the time being, and Mr. CARLISLE, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, nominates the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and all the members of the committee, and therefore the chairman of that committee occupies the position of representing the Government in bringing forward such bills as will represent the views and sentiments of the Democratic party in the United States supporting the Administration.

What have we seen? The ink is barely dry upon this treaty before he, as the representative of the Government and chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, brings forward a measure to do what? Why, to make free articles that Canada sends into the United States, and upon which last year $1,800,000 of duty was paid.

Some Hon. MEMBERS. We paid?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I ask, sir, if that is nothing?

Some Hon. MEMBERS. Who paid?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to insult both the great political parties of this country who have since 1854 and long before, maintained that the interests of Canada, the interests of British North America, were intimately bound up in obtaining free intercourse with the United States for our natural products; I do not intend to insult the two great parties of this country by telling them that they were fools; that they did not know what they were doing.

Down to the present hour we have adopted the policy on both sides of the House, and we have pledged ourselves to the people to do everything that lay in our power to obtain a free market for the natural products of our country with the United States, and I say you must answer me the question as to whether that was an act of supreme folly or whether it was wise statesmanship on the part of both parties in this country to adopt that policy, before you ask me such a question as "Who pays the duty?"

I say that under this bill which has been introduced and which, I believe, will pass, for it does not require two-thirds of the Senate where the Republican majority is only one in the whole House to pass this bill, it requires a majority of one only, and I am very sanguine that this bill will pass during the present session. Modified it may be, but I am inclined to think the amendments will be still more in the interests of Canada than as the bill stands to-day.

If this is the case I think we may congratulate ourselves upon securing the free admission of our lumber, upon which was paid during the last year no less than $1,315,450. On copper ore, made free by the Mills bill, we paid, or there was paid—to make it meet the views of the honorable gentlemen opposite more correctly—$96,945.

On salt $21,992 duty was paid. This is rendered free by the Mills bill. I am sorry to find, as I hoped would be the case from the first copy of the bill that came to me, that potatoes were not included in vegetables. I am sorry to find there is a doubt as to whether the term "vegetables" not specially enumerated will not exclude potatoes. In grappling with this policy of making the natural products of the two countries free, you do not expect any person who wants to carry a bill to put a heavier load upon his shoulders than he is able to carry, lest he may break down and do nothing. You expect him to take it in detail, and, as I believe, you will find the policy contained in this bill of making those natural products of Canada free carried out until you have perfect freedom of intercourse between the natural products of Canada and the United States. Of wool we sent last year 1,319,309 pounds of one kind and a variety of other kinds, upon which a duty was paid to the extent of $183,852. Now, as I say, on articles of prime importance and interest to Canada the removal of duty by the Mills bill amounts to no less than $1,800,193.

In the measure I submit I believe will be found a bill of vital importance to Canada to pass.

I believe, sir, that we owe it to the Empire as well as to ourselves steadily to keep in view every measure that will conduce to the rapid progress of Canada, the development of our inexhaustible resources, and the building up of a great and powerful British Dominion on this side of the Atlantic. I say, sir, that in the discharge of my duty I have steadily kept that conviction in view, and I believe the course which has been pursued will not only commend itself to the judgment and the support of the great majority in this House, but that the great majority of the people in this country will feel that in the adoption of this treaty we are taking a step that is calculated to conduce to the progress and greatness and best interests of Canada.

And, Mr. Chairman, we have the very best assurance of the fact that Canada was promised free trade in the legislation which is now proposed for the adoption of this House. Well might Sir Charles say that—

The ink is barely dry upon the treaty before the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means brings forward a measure to that effect.

To do what? Why,

To make free articles that Canada sends into the United States, and upon which last year $1,800,000 of duty was paid.

Yes, that is how much gain the Canadians obtain by this legislation. That is why the honorable gentleman introduced this bill. We need have no misunderstanding about it. It is not in the interest of the United States. It is the bonus they propose to give Canada and Great Britain for having yielded up something in the matter of the fisheries. This Administration can not negotiate treaties upon a fair level with Great Britain. Our country has fallen so low that it has to buy any rights it obtains by throwing up and giving away what we ourselves are entitled to.

Let it be known, then, that this bill is not for our advantage or for the advantage of the people of the United States, that the charge is true that it is in the interest of foreigners. It is to give to Canada $1,800,000 annually and far more. That it is to be given by an attack on our own industries. That our own laborers are to be thrown out of employment and our factories closed that Canada may thrive. The Canadians have no doubt but that our tariff duties are paid by them. They know very well they do not come off the people of the United States.

They know very well who pays the duty, and Sir Charles, in getting a promise that it shall be repealed, has a good reason why Canada might yield a little something upon the fisheries question. And in return for this confidence on the part of the representative of the British Government we see the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means introducing this bill and doing all he can to return the Canadians something not in kind, but of much more value. He says further:

You will observe that on salt $21,992 duty was paid last year. This is rendered free by the Mills bill.

Twenty-one thousand dollars bonus to Canada.

Sir Charles grows pathetic and can not conceal his disappointment when he adds—

I am sorry to find, as I hoped would be the case from the first copy of the bill that came to me, that potatoes were not included amongst vegetables.

Hence gentlemen on the other side have the Canadian authority for it that potatoes will not come in under that clause. I can now understand why the honorable chairman was so certain this morning that potatoes would not be free. The parties most interested admit it. He says that in grappling with this policy of making the natural products of the two countries free, which is the English for free trade, he does not expect any person who wants to carry a bill through the United States Congress to put a heavier load upon his shoulders than he is able to carry. How considerate he is of our free-trade friends. Alas, I fear they have already shouldered more than they will be able to carry far.

This gives a new meaning to the expression often repeated here by the friends of this bill, that it is only a step in the right direction; that we are to go further and carry bigger loads for our Canadian brethren hereafter.

One provision of the treaty is only to go into effect, it says on its face, when we give Canada free trade in certain enumerated articles. I would ask the chairman of the Ways and Means to explain to Congress and the country whether Sir Charles had authority for the use he makes of alleged assurances of free-trade legislation. If we get valuable concessions from Canada for free trade, I would also like to know whether anything is promised us from other countries that will gain by the passage of the Mills bill. If our own people must suffer by this legislation, let us know whether we are even promised anything from the countries of Europe and Asia. Gentlemen of the majority, explain yourselves. Are you working in the interest of American or of foreign countries?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. Chairman, I will print the extract I have quoted in connection with my remarks.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, to come out of my time, if the gentleman will kindly give me his attention. The gentleman referred to a tax on salt that Sir Charles Tupper said would be released. He referred to it in connection with a question as to who pays the tax. Does not that tax relate to American salt imported into Canada?

Mr. JACKSON. I do not quite catch the gentleman's question. Will he please repeat it?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Sir Charles Tupper was referring to a tax paid by the Canadians on American salt imported into Canada.

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, no; he was referring to the duty paid by the Canadians to bring their salt into our market. He enumerates a number of other things, and goes right on. He comes to the wool after awhile, and to the ores and a great number of things, and shows just how much is to be given to them by this bill.

Mr. GROUT. Seven or eight millions.

Mr. JACKSON. In the aggregate, yes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I understood the gentleman to say this: That Sir Charles Tupper takes the position that the Canadians will be relieved of some $23,000 tax that they pay for Canadian salt coming into America.

Mr. JACKSON. To bring it into our market. They have been paying that much for the liberty of coming into our market and selling on equality with our own people. This they will be relieved of if the Mills bill passes, for then they can come in free.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I am only asking for the fact.

Mr. JACKSON. That is the way I understand the argument. In fact it can not be understood any other way. It is plainly so stated.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Sir Charles Tupper takes the position that it is a release of so much tax to the Canadians.

Mr. JACKSON. Yes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I only wanted to know what the fact was.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, a New York house (Messrs. Miles & Holman) handling pearl barley, oat-meal, and pease and split pease, makes the following statement:

In reference to split pease, we can not compete with Canada. The duty on split pease is only 20 per cent., and the barrel they are packed in comes in free. The duty should be taken off the round or whole pea and the duty left on the split pease, thus giving manufacturers here an opportunity to make split pease, and thus reduce the revenue, and our people would have their pea soup just as cheap, with the satisfaction of eating their own manufacture and not encouraging our Canadian neighbors. You will see that the importation of split pease can thus be stopped and revenue reduced without increasing the cost to our people, and building up their manufactures to the detriment of our own.

Yet, as to garden seeds, and beans, pease, and split pease, this bill offers Canadians free the markets of 62,000,000 people, while they, raising far more than they can consume, have no reciprocal market to offer us.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not quite understand the attitude occupied by the members of the committee who are responsible for this bill. It would seem that a committee proposing to make great changes affecting manufacturers and dealers and producers throughout the country would be willing to tell us what was the theory upon which they had acted. Men upon this side of the House rise and show how their localities will be injured, how their constituents will be harmed, how great interests will be damaged or destroyed, but the gentlemen upon the other side sit still without making any response as to why they seek to make these changes, and when the time comes stolidly—I do not use the word in an offensive sense—but in effect, I say, they stolidly vote us down. I would like to have gentlemen tell us, for example, why it is that they propose to make fresh and salted vegetables free of duty while they require protection on their own rice.

I would like to have them tell us upon this item under consideration why it is that they make beans, pease, and split pease free, while they provide for protection upon items that benefit themselves? I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee while I ask him to inform the House how it is that split pease, which every one who knows anything about the subject knows are a manufactured article, should be put in the same free-trade class with whole pease and beans. I would like some explanation of that. It is well known that split pease are a manufactured article, and that there are houses with large capital employed in the business of gathering pease, splitting them by machinery, and selling them for culinary purposes, and yet these gentlemen put them in the same free-trade category with beans and whole pease. I wish also to protest, in the interest and upon the judgment and complaint of a farming community, against this proposition which comes to us from the other side of the House that the products of the farm are raw materials.

The granges, the farmers' societies, the husbandmen's newspapers, the rural organizations everywhere are denouncing that assertion upon which this legislation is based as an assertion utterly false, and, to them, ruinously false; and yet gentlemen on the other side go on acting upon the theory that pease and beans and vegetables, fresh, or in salt or brine, and tallow, and fresh milk, and wool, and meat, and poultry, and all such products are "raw material." Although they contain in their amount and volume the results of much of the labor of the greatest body of workers upon the American continent, yet these Democratic legislators have the effrontery to face the farmers and tell them that the products which take their inception under their care, and become articles of commerce under their supervision, are raw materials, like the ore in the earth and the unquarried rock, etc., and, therefore, for the benefit of workmen whose work is protected, and of manufacturers whose output is protected, these products of the farmer's toil shall be made free. I think the farmers will make an answer to this proposition which the gentlemen in charge of this bill will, by and by, understand.

Mr. MILLS. I hope we shall now have a vote on this line.

The question was taken on the motion to strike out the line, and it was rejected—ayes 45, noes 59.

Mr. VANDEVER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, is that in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. VANDEVER. I move to strike out the last word, and in that connection I desire to say that one of the chief staple products of my country is beans. The probability is that we raise beans enough in that section to feed two or three States. We load vessel after vessel with them in the fall of the year, and send them away; and although there is but 10 per cent. duty upon beans under existing law, yet the proposition to put them upon the free-list comes directly in conflict with the interests of that portion of the country.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, following up the items of this bill one after another, as though the blows were rained more directly and frequently than anywhere else upon the interests of the Pacific side of the country, and especially against California. I am very willing, however, to accord some credit to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means for the concession he has made to-day in consenting to strike from the free-list plums and prunes, which also are products of very great value in that part of the country. Another product of the California coast is raisins. I have already referred to other products of that Southern California country, which has been called the Italy of America, and whose products come directly in competition with those of old Italy, and I can not but recur to the fact that immediately preceding the assembling of this Congress, when it was given out by the leaders of the Democratic party that one of the chief measures of policy in this Congress would be the modification of the tariff law, there were poured in appeals to members of Congress from these foreign interests to put raisins and plums and other products of that kind upon the free-list; and in deference to such appeals various provisions have been put into this bill at the expense of our own interests in America, especially the interests of the southren part of California, that favored land to which so many people are now turning their faces, as they did in the early history of the settlement of that country. These things are making their impression; and although there has been accorded to us to-day by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means a small crumb of comfort, it will not turn aside the people of that country in their condemnation of a policy which lends a willing ear to appeals from abroad and at the same time sacrifices our home interests. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In what I have to say upon this line, 148, I do not wish to speak of politics at all. The district which I represent is very largely interested in the growth of beans, some of our farmers raising as much as 2,000 bushels of this one article. In reading this bill, I have been at a loss to understand upon what principle this product is selected for a place on the free-list. I asked this question of one member of the committee, and he could give me no reason. I really wish I could be enlightened as to the reason why this particular agricultural product should have been selected for a place on the free-list.

If the answer be made that the intention is to make food cheap for the laboring people, why is not every agricultural product suitable for food placed on the free-list? Why not flour, or meal, or rice, or wheat, or cheese, or butter? I can not imagine or conceive of any good reason. None has been given.

This bill should be based upon some consistent principle. No one article should be taken off or put on the free-list unless there be some good reason for it. Rice is necessary for the poor man and the invalid; beans are also necessary for the poor man; why should not these two articles be placed upon an equality? It seems to me that a sense of justice would dictate that the farmers in one locality should be treated with the same fairness as the farmers of another locality.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. This question of beans is one with which I am somewhat familiar; I have dealt in the article for a good many years.

Mr. MILLS. I appeal to gentlemen on the other side to let us make some progress with the bill. There have been three or four speeches over there on this question.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I will not take more than a few minutes. I wish to state to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who is a warm advocate of the farmers and the protection of their interests, that he is making a great mistake in proposing to place beans on the free-list. Beans constitute one of the greatest articles of production of the farmers in some sections of our country, especially in New York State, and also, as has been said, in California. Even with the present tariff on beans, it should be remembered the Germans supply a great portion of our country with this product.

What, then, will be the effect of taking off the duty? Will it not simply result in the Germans furnishing the whole supply to our people? The effect will be to drive our American farmers into raising more extensively wheat and corn and those products for which, as the gentleman from Texas says, they are now underpaid. If they do not now get enough for these products, why should the gentleman from Texas drive them into raising still larger quantities of them, in consequence of beans being placed on the free-list? In spite of the duty, as I have already suggested, German beans are to a large extent supplanting those of American growth. If the duty be taken off, of course the importation will be increased. The farmers in Germany and other foreign countries are not paid so well as the farmers in this country; consequently our market will be deluged with their product, and our farmers, the very men whom the gentleman from Texas claims to be so desirous of protecting, will be injured.

The gentleman has remarked that the price of wheat is controlled to a great extent by the tariff, because, as he says, Europe, in consequence of the tariff, does not take wheat enough from us. He is greatly mistaken in that assertion. The truth is, Europe takes the surplus which we have to spare every year. The gentleman's other idea, that Europe regulates the price, is also a great mistake. Europe has no more to do with regulating the price of wheat in this country than with regulating the price of hickory-nuts. The price of wheat is not regulated in Europe, but in Chicago, and it is not regulated by supply and demand, but simply by the gambling——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. I now ask for a vote.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pulp, for paper-makers' use.

Mr. BYNUM. I move to amend by striking out the line just read.

Mr. REED. What is the objection to that line?

The motion of Mr. BYNUM was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bibles, books, and pamphlets, printed in other languages than English, and books and pamphlets and all publications of foreign governments, and publications of foreign societies, historical or scientific, printed for gratuitous distribution.

Bristles.

Bulbs and bulbous roots, not medicinal.

During the reading of the lines Mr. FARQUHAR rose.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have an amendment to offer to line 155.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to line 155 the words "not edible."

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move to strike out the last word.

I sought the recognition of the Chair while these lines were being read to call attention to the propriety of striking out the words "books and pamphlets," in line 150.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. FARQUHAR. But the amendment I wish to offer is first.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Very well. I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then recognize the gentleman from New York if there be no objection. But the Clerk had read down to line 155.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I sought the attention of the Chair and tried to get his recognition to offer an amendment to the line I have indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to offer an amendment if there be no objection.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I simply submit that while the House has on its Calendar an international copyright bill, which will probably meet the views of the House and become a law, it is unfair to the American publisher and the American printer and book-sellers and book-binders, and to all persons engaged in the manufacture of books, to have such a broad provision as is embraced in the words in line 150, "books and pamphlets," placed upon the free-list, whereby the country may be flooded with foreign-made books. In the admission of Bibles printed in foreign languages free there is manifest propriety, and no one can find fault with that. Nor can there be any objection to admitting books, pamphlets, and publications of foreign Governments and of foreign scientific associations. But the words I have quoted are highly objectionable as opening the door to admit all classes of publications, or all kinds of books made by foreign publishers and foreign printers.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the line before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair entertained the amendment of the gentleman from New York. There was some confusion at the time the lines were read——

Mr. MILLS. I do not want to be going back all the time; we will never get on with this bill. I object to it.

Mr. REED. The trouble seems to be that the Chairman of the committee and the Clerk failed to catch the voice of the gentleman from New York, who addressed the Chair while that paragraph was being read.

Mr. MILLS. I was listening to the reading of every word of the bill, and I know that line 155 was read.

Mr. REED. That may be very true; but I also know that I heard the gentleman from New York call the attention of the Chair to the paragraph to which he has been addressing his remarks.

Mr. MILLS. And line 155 had been read.

Mr. REED. I do not deny that; but these lines are so short that when the Clerk puts on steam enough of course he can run considerably ahead of any member who desires to attract the attention of the Chair. The fact is, the Chairman did not hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLS. I was paying attention to my business here; and I know that we had passed beyond that paragraph.

Mr. REED. Well, I am very glad to hear that the gentleman has been paying attention to his business here, for it is more than he has been doing for the business of the country.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, I object to being taken off the floor by these personal allusions.

Mr. MILLS. How did the gentleman get the floor?

Mr. REED. By the recognition of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that the lines down to 155 had been read; but as the gentleman sought recognition of the Chair, and so stated, when the preceding lines were being read, the Chair recognized him to offer an amendment.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman from New York ought to deliver his lecture to his colleague on that side of the House, who owes an apology to the House——

Mr. REED. But the gentleman from Texas is the only one who did not seem to have heard the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Did not the gentleman from New Jersey offer an amendment to line 155?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did offer an amendment, but the gentleman from New York stated that he was on the floor trying to get the attention of the Chair to offer an amendment to the preceding line, and the Chair recognized him, the gentleman from New Jersey withholding his amendment.

Mr. REED. Therefore, so far from owing an apology to the House, the Chairman of the committee has himself justified all that I said. But, Mr. Chairman, it is the rule of parliamentary law, that whenever a gentleman rises in his place and states that he has endeavored to attract the attention of the Chair when a line or a paragraph was being read, to receive that statement as absolutely true and to act upon it. It is well known to all——

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman from Maine did not say that when he commented upon my action a moment ago.

Mr. REED. The House so understood it.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman said that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means had not been attending to his business.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Texas having an apprehension in his own mind jumps at a conclusion and so interprets words that did not have that meaning. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. That is what the gentleman said himself.

Mr. REED. What I said was that the Chairman of this Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Illinois, and the Clerk perhaps had not caught the voice of the gentleman from New York. It was respectful to the Chairman of the committee, and had nothing to do with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from New York himself state that he sought recognition while this paragraph was being read?

Mr. REED. The gentleman from New York has already so stated.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Let the gentleman from New York speak for himself. He is of age.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, I made the interruption as quickly as possible and called attention to this paragraph of the bill. I waited and stood patiently until the paragraph was read and as soon as I could be recognized I called attention to it to make a motion.

Now, on this question——

Mr. KELLEY addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to state in this connection that I have collected information on this very paragraph, and hastened to my seat for the purpose of taking exception to it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I wish to say that this paragraph, this proposition to put Bibles printed in other languages than English, and books and pamphlets and all publications of foreign governments, and publications of foreign societies, historical or scientific, printed for gratuitous distribution, upon the free-list, is strictly in the line of enlightened public intelligence, and is proper and correct in all respects. I am very glad indeed that the committee has seen proper to put it in that shape. But what I do object most strenuously against is that part of line 150, "books and pamphlets," whereby you permit free trade in books and pamphlets that are exclusive of Bibles, as they appear in this paragraph, and I simply submit to the committee that with the international copyright bill on the Calendar we are going a little too hastily until we settle that matter.

There is no need of opening the door more than propriety might admit. Being an old member of the Printing Committee of this House, I know the existent comity between the American and European associations and the interchange the United States of America has made with European societies. Such favors, I think, are very proper indeed. But free trade in other books than Bibles and scientific publications I think radically wrong.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand the amendment to take from the free-list will cover books printed in German and other foreign languages than the English. Is that the intention?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is a well-known fact that no German educational books are published in this country; none whatever. School-books in the German language are not published in this country. By placing them upon the dutiable-list you are simply levying a tax upon education.

Mr. BRUMM. You are mistaken.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Totally mistaken.

Mr. BRUMM. There are publishing houses in Philadelphia that issue those books.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am informed by an eminent German scholar, who is very well informed on the subject, that there are no German text-books published in this country.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does he not know there are such books published in New York to-day?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am told by a gentleman I have the highest confidence in——

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am told by a student who sits here and who studies them that they are published in New York.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Indeed they are.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not speak from personal knowledge, but only from what I have been told by a very intelligent editor of one of the leading German newspapers published in this country.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I have printed French text-books myself.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. All I have to say, then, is, if you are correct, that by keeping these books upon the dutiable-list you are simply levying a tax upon education, which is wrong.

Mr. BRUMM. Oh, no.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is a sample of their reasoning.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It does seem to me that this step which the Committee on Ways and Means propose to take is as short a step as the American Congress ought to be willing to take, and that instead of striking out books and pamphlets from this provision it would be better to add to the provision and make all literature free. I shall not now enter into any discussion about the copyright law, to which my friend from New York referred, because it does not touch this question at all.

This question stands upon an entirely different principle and is an entirely different question. I am a very strong friend of the international copyright law—not so much a friend of all the provisions of the proposed measure as of the principle which underlies it. I hope this House, before it adjourns, will pass the bill which has been passed by the Senate. We can all agree on that bill, however we differ on the principles of tariff legislation; and this can be easily demonstrated at the proper time.

But such discussion is not germane to this provision. This is simply a provision by which Bibles, books, and pamphlets printed in another language than our own may be brought in by the scholars of the country, by persons who are interested in larger research, in advancing the domain of knowledge, and in giving to us the benefit of the investigations made by learned men in all countries; that books may come in without having to pay unnecessary duty to a country whose Treasury is overflowing; that persons who immigrate to our country to make homes in our midst, speaking foreign languages, most generally poor persons seeking wider and better homes among us, may have an opportunity to import books printed in their own language at as low a cost as possible.

Therefore, in all the aspects of the case it seems to me to be one of those questions upon which both sides may agree without regard to our differences of opinion upon economic questions. Surely no one will go to the extent of saying that taxes and duties ought to be levied on learning simply for the purpose of protection. Protection ought not to go so far as to make the means of knowledge more expensive merely for the purpose of taxation, and that, too, at a time when there is no necessity for the tax and when we are removing taxation. In the effort to eliminate subjects of taxation, in trying to reduce the revenue by assorting the subjects upon which the taxes are laid, what better subject for release from duty can possibly be found than good books?

From what can we possibly take the burden better than from a tool for education? From what could we in this nineteenth century better take taxation off than knowledge?

Petitions from not less than sixteen States, from over a score of the leading universities and colleges of the Union, and from many private citizens have prayed that this change be made. Petitions from those making private gain by means of our tariff duties are reverently received, carefully obeyed, and jealously filed by gentlemen; but petitions from men who are only scholars, teachers, and thinkers carry no weight and are set aside carelessly.

I regret that we do not see our way clear to go further than we have in this provision. I wish that we thought we were able to make all books, all art, all productions of human genius, in print or picture or sculpture, free.

Milton plead for unlicensed printing; and in a freer and richer country literary and scholarly gentlemen, who would feel hurt if any one doubted their love for learning or friendship for culture, plead for taxed books—a demonstration of the tyranny of party discipline and of the cowardice which political ambition creates.

I do not believe America less worthy than England of Milton's compliment.

Lords and Commons of England! consider what nation it is whereof ye are and whereof ye are governors. A nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious, and piercing spirit; acute to invent, subtle and sinewy to discourse, not beneath the reach of any point the highest that human capacity can soar to.

And it is scarcely less a crime to exclude from our people these books than it would be to murder them; and—books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a progeny of life in them to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively and as vigorously productive as those fabulous dragon's teeth, and being sown up and down may chance to spring up armed men. And yet, on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book.

Who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were, in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. It is true, no age can restore a life whereof, perhaps, there is no great loss; and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse.

We should be wary, therefore, what persecution we wage against the living labors of public men, how we spill that seasoned life of man preserved and stored up in books, since we see a kind of homicide may be thus committed, sometimes a martyrdom; and if it extends to the whole impression, a kind of massacre, whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at the æthereal and fifth essence, the breath of reason itself; slays an immortality rather than a life.

The effort to strike out this provision is protection gone mad. It is of a piece with the effort to keep books from the slave or the Bible from the people. The demands of the system require this subserviency, and no appeal can break the stubborn array around every "protected" interest, so that all within the trenches shall be defended by the united power of all. But the defense will be fruitless.

As much has been said to-day concerning the platforms recently adopted by the two parties, I desire to say that the bill reported is in exact accordance with the platform adopted by the Democratic convention at Chicago, upon which the victory of 1884 was achieved.

"All taxation shall be limited to the requirements of economical government." "Unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation." "The Democracy pledges itself * * * to reduce taxation to the lowest limit consistent with due regard to the preservation of the faith of the nation to its creditors and pensioners." This was the declaration by the Democratic party of the true limitation on the power to levy and collect taxes of every sort, and its pledge, if given power, to reduce taxation to that limit. It recognized that "many industries have come to rely upon legislation for successful continuance," and therefore "that any change of law must be at every step regardful of the labor and capital involved;" that "the process of reform must be subject to this plain dictate of justice."

The reform must be accomplished, but "knowing full well, however, that legislation affecting the occupations of the people should be cautious and conservative in method, not in advance of public opinion but responsive to its demands," it pledged itself to "revise the tariff," cautiously and with conservatism, "in a spirit of fairness to all interests," and with frequent appeals to an enlightened public opinion. So, too, it pledged itself "to reduce taxation," "but in making reduction in taxes it is not proposed to injure any domestic industry, but rather to promote their healthy growth;" and it declared its belief and purpose that "the necessary reduction in taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country."

The pledge was, therefore, "to reduce taxation to the lowest limit consistent" with our national obligations, and "to revise the tariff;" these are the objects to be accomplished, and the whole power intrusted to a party put in control of the Government was pledged to their "execution."

The mode of the revision of the tariff was with equal clearness pointed out. It is to obtain the revenues "from custom-house taxes on fewer imported articles, bearing heaviest on articles of luxury and bearing lightest on articles of necessity," and "by freeing American manufacturers from a hopeless competition with manufacturing nations" by removing taxes from off "raw materials."

The amount of revenue to be raised is to be so curtailed that not one dollar shall be raised except "exclusively for public purposes," and then not to exceed, even "for public purposes," "the needs of the Government economically administered." As this reduction, cautiously made, "in a spirit of fairness," will gradually render a smaller and smaller sum necessary to be raised, the revision of the tariff shall also, in "the process of reform, be subject in its execution to the same cautious spirit of fairness." But revision and reduction shall not cease, nor be delayed; both shall be at once commenced.

"The fewer imported articles" on which custom-house taxes are to remain can only be selected by elimination, by taking from the dutiable list those which are not to be taxed and placing them on the free-list. This elimination must be gradual; and in this selection two rules are laid down:

First. The American manufacturer must be given free raw materials. It will not do to say that there is no pledge to do this. We denounced the Republican party for not doing this; and no gentleman or honest man will consent to say that he denounced another for that which he approves, and if given power would continue. The declaration is eloquent and ringing.

It (the Republican party) professes the protection of American manufactures. It has subjected them to an increased flood of manufactured goods and a hopeless competition with manufacturing nations, not one of which taxes raw materials.

Second. By putting on the free-list "articles of necessity."

But this was not all the revision pledged; for "the inequalities of the tariff" were to be removed, and that with the object kept steadily in view that the revenues produced by tariff taxes should be "exclusively for public purposes;" and therefore every rate imposed for any other purpose was gradually and cautiously to be changed until that purpose was accomplished.

Every limitation imposed in this platform, but one, on these pledges is as to the time of the execution of the "process of reform." "It shall be done wisely, gradually, regardful of the labor and capital involved."

There is one limitation imposed as to the nature of reform; it is that "the necessary reduction in taxation must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor;" so that the pledge was given that so much of "any increased cost of production" in those "fewer imported articles," which are "articles of luxury," and not "articles of necessity," or "raw materials" as is caused by "the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country" may be protected by the rates imposed. This is the only item to which protection can be given. As to all other items, we are pledged against protection. Let us recognize in good faith this limitation, but let us, like wise men, be honest in applying it.

It is not to be disregarded, nor is it to be used as a cover for every sort of inequality and favoritism; a pretense to be taken advantage of for improper ends and to excuse every form of class legislation and the prostitution of governmental power to private gain.

"Free raw materials," "custom-house taxes on fewer imported articles," "Federal taxation exclusively for public purposes," in order that American manufacturers may compete successfully with foreign manufacturers; that "all American industries," of which "the many have been impoverished to subsidize the few," may flourish; that American labor may find constant and profitable employment; that the products of American soil may find ready sale, and the husbandman receive fair return from his harvest—this was our solemn pledge. To reduce expenses and taxation so that the public debt may be paid; the pensioner receive the evidence of a nation's gratitude; and industry be followed by comfort and rewarded by competence—this is what we plighted our faith to accomplish.

But if there had been no pledge, no platform, that would have been our bounden duty. It is an august trust to be intrusted with the power to manage the affairs of this great Republic, and the acceptance of the trust imposes an obligation we can not avoid.

This platform meant only that the revision of the tariff should be fairly and cautiously carried on until a revenue system was substituted for the present unjust and iniquitous congeries of legislative exactions. The present bill was prepared in the precise spirit of that platform.

But two constructions had been placed upon its language, and the St. Louis convention has adjudicated as between those who placed these diverse constructions upon it, by declaring that "it indorses the views expressed by President Cleveland in his last annual message as the correct interpretation of that platform upon the issue of tariff reductions."

I quote from that message:

The difficulty attending a wise and fair revision of our tariff laws is not underestimated. It will require on the part of the Congress great labor and care, and especially a broad and national contemplation of the subject, and a patriotic disregard of such local and selfish claims as are unreasonable and reckless of the welfare of the entire country.

Under our present laws more than four thousand articles are subject to duty. Many of these do not in any way compete with our own manufactures and many are hardly worth attention as subjects of revenue. A considerable reduction can be made in the aggregate, by adding them to the free-list. The taxation of luxuries presents no features of hardship; but the necessaries of life used and consumed by all the people, the duty upon which adds to the cost of living in every home, should be greatly cheapened.

The radical reduction of the duties imposed upon raw material used in manufactures, or its free importation, is of course an important factor in any effort to reduce the price of these necessaries; it would not only relieve them from the increased cost caused by the tariff on such material, but the manufactured product being thus cheapened that part of the tariff now laid upon such product, as a compensation to our manufacturers for the present price of raw material, could be accordingly modified. Such reduction or free importation would serve beside to largely reduce the revenue.

It is not apparent how such a change can have any injurious effect upon our manufacturers. On the contrary, it would appear to give them a better chance in foreign markets with the manufacturers of other countries, who cheapen their wares by free material. Thus our people might have the opportunity of extending their sales beyond the limits of home consumption—saving them from the depression, interruption in business, and loss caused by a glutted domestic market, and affording their employés more certain and steady labor, with its resulting quiet and contentment.

* * * * * * *

Our progress toward a wise conclusion will not be improved by dwelling upon the theories of protection and free trade. This savors too much of bandying epithets. It is a condition which confronts us—not a theory. Relief from this condition may involve a slight reduction of the advantages which we award our home productions, but the entire withdrawal of such advantages should not be contemplated. The question of free trade is absolutely irrelevant; and the persistent claim made in certain quarters, that all efforts to relieve the people from unjust and unnecessary taxation are schemes of so-called free-traders, is mischievous and far removed from any consideration for the public good.

The simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government, and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury through the perversion of governmental powers.

It was, indeed, consistent to follow the indorsement of the message of the President with it "also indorses the efforts of our Democratic Representatives in Congress to secure a reduction in taxation," and to make a distinct approval of the pending bill. This bill, prepared to meet a condition and not to fit a theory, has met the approval of the Democratic party, because it is moderate, conservative, and compromising; avoiding extremes we have in good faith sought practical results, that would be of good to every class of our citizens. It has gained strength every day since we reported it; it will more and more commend itself to the thoughtful as it is better understood and more discussed.

It is a partial remedy for our present condition; it is the only practicable remedy just now. Let our opponents fairly face this alternative—this bill in substance or no remedy, and they must take the responsibility of its defeat in the Senate, where they have the majority. A reduction of revenue will be never "needed" if the Republican party is given power, as more than the present income will be "needed" for the appropriations, "needed" "for the early rebuilding of our Navy, for the construction of coast fortifications and modern ordnance and other approved modern means of defense for the protection of our defenseless harbors and the channels of internal, coastwise, and foreign commerce; for the encouragement of the shipping interests of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific States;" for "free schools" and "pensions."

In each of these schemes, to which unlimited governmental aid is promised, there are contingent "jobs" of huge proportions, and the American people might as well realize that Republican victory means no reduction of revenue; but the proposed remedy is, first, by the repeal of the tax on tobacco; second, tax on alcohol used in the arts and for mechanical purposes; third, such revision of the tariff as will tend to check imports—that is, an increase of duties on such articles as are produced by our people, the production of which gives employment to our labor; fourth, the release from import duties of articles of foreign production (except luxuries) the like of which can not be produced at home; fifth, the repeal, if necessary, of the internal taxes.

This is an impossible and wholly impracticable policy; it is a delusion and a snare, and can never be made permanent. It means perpetual agitation and instability. The present bundle of sections known as our tariff law can not be permanently maintained, and an attempt to enact higher duties will fail. The rival private interests will not be able to agree on another revision that will tend to check imports.

If it were possible, it is iniquitous. The proffer really made by the party at Chicago is large expenditures of public money to be raised by increased duties, so that the burdens of taxation shall be increased in both modes—by increased expenditures and increased cost of living. The tax-payer must pay tribute to those in whose interest the duties are increased and to those to whom these new expeditures shall be paid. This means that power shall be obtained by the contributions and exertions of those who are to receive pecuniary and private gain from the Government.

The issue is fairly made—strict economy, decreased expenditures, reduced taxation by removal of burdens from the necessaries of life; against increased expenditures, larger appropriations, higher taxation, and continued legislation for those who can combine and control the party machinery.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FARQUHAR rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am very well satisfied that upon inquiry the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] will find that none of the school-books used in the teaching of German are published in this country. I hope, therefore, the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, or that it will be defeated and these books, etc., be placed on the free-list.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to the fact that they have entirely missed the scope of this paragraph. All of these books are for gratuitous distribution. We are not discussing universal knowledge at all; all of these books are for gratuitous distribution.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" on the Democratic side.]

The amendment was rejected—ayes 53, noes 70.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a misunderstanding on the part of some of us here as to the true meaning of this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman submit an amendment?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; I move to strike out the last word. As I read this paragraph, Bibles and books or pamphlets printed in other languages than English are to come in free.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. That is right.

Mr. KELLEY. That is your interpretation of it?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Then, in addition to that, "books, pamphlets, and all publications of foreign governments, and publications of foreign societies, historical or scientific, printed for gratuitous distribution." That would let in those valuable documents issued annually after a big dinner by the Cobden Club, which calls itself scientific. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, I want to speak seriously to the mistakes of fact of the gentlemen on the other side. Had the Ways and Means Committee been accessible to information, or had the five Republican members of that committee had extended to them in this connection the ordinary courtesies of that and other committees of the House, I would have had before them Mr. Ignatius Kohler, the head of one of the oldest publishing houses in Philadelphia, with the heads of large publishing houses of foreign books in New York, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Milwaukee, and other cities in which there is a large population of the poor people spoken of by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] who want reading in their own languages, and among whom are to be found printers, type-founders, paper-makers, book-binders, and workers in all the manifold industries which are involved in producing books.

There are in the United States large establishments engaged wholly in the production of books and pamphlets in foreign languages, and I can see no reason in the world why we shall not give the same protection to the American paper-maker, type-founder, press-builder, and book-binder, and to those engaged in all the various branches of the book-making industry, whether the books are printed in the English language or in any other.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Can the gentleman tell us the name of any firm in the United States engaged in publishing German educational works?

Mr. KELLEY. Scribner & Co.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do they publish German educational works?

Mr. KELLEY. I think they do. There is in this country one very large firm, not that of Scribner & Co., which prints nothing but books in foreign languages. I made inquiry on the subject when I supposed the information would be useful before the Ways and Means Committee, and I had arranged with Mr. Kohler that he should have notice when the committee came to determine these questions; but I had to write to him that I had overestimated my influence with my colleagues on that committee, and could not get him or his associates, the other printers and publishers to whom I have referred, a hearing before the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to ask my friend whether he is willing to put a tax upon knowledge just to benefit two or three large firms?

Mr. KELLEY. I stand by the American paper-maker, printer, type-founder, book-binder, whether he is engaged in printing and binding books in English or in a foreign language, and I tell the gentleman there are other large American establishments engaged exclusively in the production of books in foreign languages.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. At the expense of the dissemination of knowledge?

Mr. KELLEY. No; not at the expense of anybody.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], in relation to a subject which he does not appear to understand, that there are over twenty firms in this country engaged in reprinting foreign works in the foreign languages, principally German and French. Many of those works are brought out in sheets and rebound. If you adopt this paragraph you will put out of employment 5,000 men in the city of New York alone.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Oh, no!

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. The gentleman does not live in New York and does not know anything about this. The result will be to send the binding of all these works to Germany and France, while, if they come to us simply in printed form, employment is given to a number of establishments in different cities of this country.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think the gentleman will find he is mistaken.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I think that a bill to put on the free-list books in foreign languages was introduced by a gentleman on the other side of the House and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, by which it was considered.

Mr. KELLEY. It is quite possible that some gentleman on this side of the House may have had such a measure suggested to him, and may have made the mistake of presenting it. But I say to the gentleman that the publication of books in foreign languages is a very large branch of business in New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Chicago, and Milwaukee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOPKINS] and another gentleman assure me that it is also a very considerable business in Baltimore.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to state how many men are employed in the city of New York in reprinting, binding, and preparing for our market publications in foreign languages.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My understanding, obtained from a very eminent German scholar, the editor of a German paper published in this country, is that there is not a single establishment in the United States engaged in publishing German school-books.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. The gentleman's information is entirely wrong.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Illinois is utterly mistaken.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. I ask my friend from Illinois to name the gentleman from whom he has obtained his information.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have no hesitation in naming him. I refer to Dr. Preus, the editor of a very prominent German paper published in St. Louis. I know the gentleman I speak of to be one of the most eminent scholars who has come to this country from Germany. In my judgment he is well informed in reference to this matter.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. I repeat that the effect of this measure will be to throw out of employment thousands of men in New York City alone, and to deal a fatal blow at a most important industry.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pro forma amendment is exhausted. If there be no objection, it will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, we have again heard from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] the old story about the lack of opportunity for introducing evidence and deficient courtesy in the Committee on Ways and Means, not a word of which, I wish to say, with no desire to be personal to the gentleman, is in accordance with the facts.

Mr. KELLEY. It is according to the facts as I found them.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I do not mean to raise any personal issue with the gentleman.

I wish to file a positive and emphatic denial of every statement and every insinuation of the character to which I have referred, both from the gentleman and from his associates. For a month we consulted only the convenience of gentlemen of the minority. They were considered by us competent representatives of the interests for which they pretended especially to speak. The petitions and arguments laid before the committee were always there, welcome to be brought up.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to have read a short extract to show in what sharp contrast our conduct was to that of the Republican majority of the same committee in a previous Congress. This was when they were trying to do what we are now trying to do—to reduce tariff taxes as they promised to do. They occupy new ground now.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, January 20, 1883.]

APPLICATION OF THE GAG IN THE TARIFF DEBATE.

To the Editor of the Inquirer:

SIR: The Committee on Ways and Means having, after the manner of the famous and tyrannical Council of Ten of Venice, which tried and convicted men without permitting them to appear before it, refused to hear any one in defense of the thousands of industries which are imperiled by proposed tariff legislation, it was eminently proper that Judge KELLEY, the chairman, should offer a resolution in the House of Representatives in which it was proposed that "general debate upon the pending bill (H. R. 7313) reported from the Committee on Ways and Means be limited to one day, to be equally divided between the friends and opponents of the bill." Indeed, it seems a great piece of condescension that he or his committee should voluntarily propose to permit any general debate upon the measure at all. * * *

HENRY CAREY BAIRD.

PHILADELPHIA, January 19, 1883.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I ask the Clerk to read, also, an extract I have marked from the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the 22d of April, 1872.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KELLEY. Here is a bill for the reduction of taxes and duties covering sixty-three pages, in which there are items sometimes of only a line, on which a whole day of debate would be spent under the five-minute rule. If we adjourn on the 29th of May we shall have repealed no tax or duty, and the people will ask us in every paper and at every corner why we have continued the system of taxation, so largely in excess of the demands of the Government and the reduction of the public debt, at the rate of $50,000,000 per annum outside of what is already provided by law. On neither side of the House can justification be found, nor do I believe apologies, for having hastily adopted a resolution of adjournment which will prove entirely satisfactory to the tax-payers, who are loaded at every point and whose profits are absorbed in the excessive Treasury of the Government.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. When the gentlemen themselves sought to keep some of their pledges to the people, they found themselves obliged to shut out of the committee-room the lobbyists and those who clamored around them. Having done nothing and yielded to the clamor of monopoly, they now invoke the lobby without limit. Sir, we did not limit time to the official representatives of any interest in this country to speak for the people, or for the interests that they had at heart. After we have thus given the amplest opportunity of that kind—after all these days and weeks of debate, it comes with a poor grace for gentlemen to get up here with the miserable insinuations and misstatements that they make about this question. I say to the gentleman now, as he said when he had some regard for his pledges, in 1872, that if you do not reduce the taxes and lessen the surplus revenue flowing into the Treasury, you will not be able, when you confront a justly indignant people, to find any adequate excuse for such a breach of public faith.

Mr. KELLEY. I had as much regard for my word in 1872 as the gentleman has had for his at any time from the time he learned to lisp his words, and as much now as I had in 1872.

He sends to the desk to have read a communication from a fanatic, who, if somebody telegraphed him over a responsible name that I had been stricken dumb in a tariff debate, and although alive and apparently well, had become black and my hair had become curly like that of a negro, he would jump up and exclaim, "I knew hell would overtake him for refusing me a hearing four years ago because I refused to go before the Tariff Commission." [Laughter.]

That is the whole case. I say again, and I say it veraciously, this bill in this paragraph proposes to close several large publishing houses in New York, perhaps one of the largest there, unless it be Scribner's, and one I have known from my boyhood, from father to son, that of Ignatius G. Kohler, in Philadelphia, and I had from Mr. Kohler the address of other houses, several in other cities, and had made arrangement they should be heard. So far as I supposed a hearing would be granted; but I had to write—and the correspondence exists—to these gentlemen that no Republican member of the Committee on Ways and Means, I nor my four associates on that committee, could get an opportunity to tell them of the extent and character of their business. I say that without fear of actual contradiction on that subject, and am confident of the support of my Republican associates, who suffered the same way on other subjects.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted, and the Chair hears no objection to the withdrawal of formal amendments.

Mr. FARQUHAR. As my statement in relation to the publication of foreign text-books in this country has been measurably called in question, I have just returned from the Congressional Library, after consultation with Mr. Spofford, the librarian. He has shown me a large list of such publications.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Here are three of the identical books.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Spofford cites the publication of German and French text-books by D. Appleton & Co., New York, and Ginn & Co., Boston.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What class of books do they publish?

Mr. FARQUHAR. They have a large catalogue of German and French text-books.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me ask the gentleman this, whether they are not known as school-books. I would like to have the gentleman tell me how it is that school-books published in the protective-tariff country of Germany can be published there and brought into this country to compete with the books published here. There is a higher protective tariff in Germany than there is in this country. How can they publish books in Germany and import them into this country and be successful in competition with ours? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there is an effort here to put a tax on knowledge in this country.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am making no attempt to put a tax on knowledge. I am trying to protect the manufacturer of books in this country. The question is whether the last clause means what it seems to mean. I contend you are opening free trade to European publishers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Read line 155.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bulbs and bulbous roots, not medicinal.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to add the word "non-edible."

Mr. MILLS. In the lines 104 to 111 we have already passed that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I offer the amendment to guard against the possibility of some customs officials ruling that bulbs and bulbous roots include edible vegetables. I do it for this reason: The growers of American onions are competing with the growers of onions in Egypt. Gentlemen may smile. It is news to them; but it is not news to the market-gardeners of the Atlantic coast, who are already feeling this competition with the fellaheen labor of Egypt.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do I understand the gentleman to say these are German text-books printed in the United States? Some, I know, are printed abroad and brought into this country, but they are not bound.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am talking about onions [laughter], and my information upon that subject is far more accurate than the information of the gentleman from Illinois upon the subject of German text-books, as I gather from what he said to-day. That discussion has passed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But I want to find out from the gentleman——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Now the gentleman is simply frittering away valuable time. [Renewed laughter.]

I have stated that I offered this amendment in the interest of the agricultural classes. During the discussion of this question we have heard the condition of the farmers bewailed, upon the other side from time to time; and I stand here to-day to say that their condition is deplorable, and to resist any attempt to make that condition worse than it is. The importation of agricultural products into this country has grown to an enormous and alarming extent within the last few years. I do not know that it was the design of the committee to increase that burdened condition which now prevails among our farmers, but the provisions of this bill certainly contribute largely to that end, and in order to guard against one blow at least at their interests I ask that the lines be amended in the manner I have suggested.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey for a moment. The existing law provides as follows:

Bulbs and bulbous roots, not medicinal, and not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

The proposed amendment takes out from that taxable classification "bulbs and bulbous roots not medicinal," leaving all others not specially enumerated at 20 per cent. ad valorem, the present rate.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not so understand it. I do not think it will have that effect at all. The provision in this list in the bill under consideration is that the importation free shall be allowed of "bulbs and bulbous roots not medicinal." Now onions may be held to come under that class; and hence I desire to add the words "not edible" to keep them out of this bill, and in the law as it now stands at the present rate.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. But they are excluded under the law.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What law?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. The existing law.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes, but I desire to put it beyond question that they are not in this bill. By implication this bill takes them out of the old law, and I want to prevent that. In fact this bill destroys the provision in the old law.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. The law now provides that bulbs or bulbous roots not specially enumerated shall pay this duty.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, I want to have it emphatic and not subject to any misconstruction, and I want them by express words kept out of this proposed free-list, and so, beyond cavil, left in the old law.

But the gentleman from Illinois has mixed his German text-books up with my onions. Now I want to mix my onions up with his German text-books. I have before me a German grammar written by a professor in Wellesley College in this country, and another by a professor of the Ruel-Browne School in New York, both printed and published by Henry Holt & Co., and copyrighted by them.

But, Mr. Chairman, while upon my feet and upon this subject I desire to call attention to a marked feature of this bill. It deals in the most severe manner with the farmers, and especially the farmers who raise varied crops. The present rates of duty upon farm products can not be said to be high. The chief of these are:

Wool at 30 cents a pound or less, 10 cents; at over 30 cents a pound, 12 cents. Beef and pork, 1 cent a pound. Hams and bacon, 2 cents a pound. Butter, 4 cents a pound. Lard, 2 cents a pound. Cheese, 4 cents a pound. Grapes, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Wheat, 20 cents a bushel. Oats, 10 cents a bushel. Corn, 10 cents a bushel. Rye, 15 cents a bushel. Barley, 15 cents a bushel. Potatoes, 15 cents a bushel. Hay, $2 a ton. Live animals, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Beeswax, 20 per. cent. ad valorem. Vinegar, 10 cents a gallon. Honey, 20 cents a gallon. Fruit, shade, and ornamental trees, shrubs, etc., 20 per cent. ad valorem. All vegetables, not otherwise provided for, 10 per cent. ad valorem. Rice, cleaned, 2½ cents per pound. Wheat-flour, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Tobacco (unmanufactured), 35 cents per pound. Sugar, 1½ to 3½ cents per pound. Rice-flour and rice-meal, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Extract of meat, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Barley, pearled or hulled, ½ cent per pound. Barley malt, 20 cents per bushel. Corn-meal, 10 cents per bushel. Oat-meal, ½ cent per pound. Rye-flour, ½ cent per pound. Potato and corn starch, 2 cents per pound. Pickles and sauces not otherwise provided for, 35 per cent. ad valorem. Garden seeds, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Hemp seed, ½ cent per pound. Currants, 1 cent per pound. Apples, 10 per cent. ad valorem. Hops, 8 cents per pound. Milk, preserved or condensed, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Flax-straw, $5 a ton. Flax, not dressed, $20 a ton. Flax, dressed, $40 a ton. Tow of flax or hemp, $10 a ton. Bristles, 15 cents a pound. Tallow, 1 cent a pound. Flaxseed or linseed, 20 cents per bushel.

These rates, as I have once before had the honor of stating, have not prevented importations, and, as already remarked, such importations have increased recently to an enormous extent. The products of the soil imported last year figure up as follows:

Animals	$4,631,846	Rice	$1,674,394
Breadstuffs	6,640,228	Sugar and molasses	74,219,607
Flax, hemp, etc., raw	12,312,833	Tobacco, raw	8,704,950
Fruits	15,840,827	Vegetables	2,350,351
Hay	790,394	Wool, raw	16,424,479
Hops	3,404,669
Barley, malt	153,363	Total	149,254,784
Provisions	1,806,239

Since these statistics were collected the importations of potatoes and onions has continued to grow enormously, and our own farmers have felt this new competition keenly. Since January 1, 1888, over 3,000,000 bushels of potatoes have reached the port of New York alone. The president of the New Jersey State Board of Agriculture, in his last annual address, said, in view of these facts:

The tariff on beans, pease, and other leguminous seeds should be raised from 10 per cent to 25 per cent.; on split beans, from 20 per cent. to 25 per cent.; garden seeds, from 20 per cent. to 25 per cent.; on hay, from $2 per ton to $3; hops, from 8 cents per pound to 10 cents per pound; pickles and sauces, from 35 per cent. to 40 per cent.; potatoes, from 15 cents per bushel to 25 cents.; on cabbage the duty should be $1 per hundred; on onions, 25 cents per bushel; and on all other vegetables it should be not less than 25 per cent. These duties are imperative, and should be demanded by every farmer and farmers' organization in the land. We are abundantly able and willing to feed all our people at prices but little, if anything, higher than are now paid for vast quantities of imported products.

How does this bill meet this condition? On looking over it I find that the Eastern farmer, driven from the raising of corn and wheat by the lower priced fertile lands of the West and low rates of transportation, and compelled to turn his attention to the production of vegetables, fruits, and other products which will not bear long transportation, is dealt a blow that must seriously cripple him. I find on this proposed free-list the following (I take them in the order given):

Flax straw; flax, not hackled or dressed; flax, hackled, known as dressed lint; tow of flax or hemp; hemp, manila, and other like substitutes for hemp; jute butts, jute; sunn, sisal-grass, and other vegetable fibers; beeswax; glue; gelatine; soap stocks; soap, hard and soft; hemp-seed and rape-seed oil; cotton-seed oil; wood tar; vegetables, in their natural state or in salt or brine, not specially enumerated or provided for; dates, plums, and prunes; currants; figs; meats, game, and poultry; milk, fresh; egg-yelks; beans, pease, and split pease; bristles, bulbs and bulbous roots; feathers of all kinds; grease; hemp and rape seed; garden seeds; flaxseed; broom-corn; tallow, and wool.

As the consideration of this bill has progressed all effort to amend in the interest of the agricultural classes has been defeated. If this be friendship for the farmer he may well pray to be delivered from his friends. I have received protest after protest against this feature of the bill from farmers, granges, and agricultural societies, and I would be derelict in my duty did I not here use my utmost efforts to change this obnoxious feature, even though I may know that the majority of this House means to vote all such efforts down. As a test of your alleged friendship for the farmer, I call on you to vote to protect his products.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN, the committee divided, and there were—ayes 58, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Feathers of all kinds, crude or not dressed, colored, or manufactured.
Finishing powder.
Grease.
Grindstones, finished or unfinished.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I move to strike out line 160.

This is not an industry, Mr. Chairman, in which my constituents are specially interested, but the State of Ohio is largely interested in it, and I desire to have read a sentence or two from the testimony that was taken before the commission in 1883. There has been no opportunity of getting information since.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Worthington, president Berea and Huron Stone Company, and others testify:

The bulk of grindstones imported into this country are made in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and used mostly in New England States, and although there may be some steel works near Philadelphia which use English stones, fully three-fourths of the manufacturers in this country use Ohio grindstones. No class of grinding for which stones found in Ohio and Michigan will not do.

If grindstones are put upon the free-list we must either cut down quarrymen's wages or abandon the market of the Eastern States.

Price of grindstones to-day is lower than ever before, which proves that the present duty does not foster monopoly.

Thousands of home labor find employment in this industry.

Imports of grindstones are not needed, but if they come they should pay duty.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. It was said in 1848 that Ohio was an abolition State any way, and I suppose that because she is a protection State now I have no right here.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I must confess that I am surprised at the effort made here to place grindstones upon the free-list when this material is abundant and inexhaustible in this country. All through the Northern part of the State of Ohio and over almost the entire State, as well as perhaps over many parts of other States, stone suitable for making grindstones is found in great abundance, and, as has just been stated, there is no complaint that they are expensive. They are cheap, they are manufactured inexpensively, and the product of this industry is very large. The present ad valorem duty on grindstones is 14.73 per cent., or nearly 15 per cent. ad valorem, and yet with this duty there were imported last year 3,159.75 tons of grindstones, valued at $37,548.75, and the duty paid to the Government was $5,529.54. It is now proposed to remove the duty entirely by placing grindstones on the free-list.

I am unable to understand why this duty should be removed, and certainly no reason has been given. Only the day before yesterday, in coming along the railroad between here and Chicago, we passed large quarries where this kind of stone is found in the greatest abundance. We passed over thousands of acres of it, and thousands of men are employed in quarrying the stone and in manufacturing the grindstones. Railroads are employed in transporting them, and they are being sent all over the country. Nothing can be more abundant in this country, and very few things are less expensive.

The proposition is to let grindstones come in free of duty. I do not see the object of such legislation. It means that the men who are now employed in this industry are to be turned out of employment, or their wages are to be reduced, and eventually the business must be abandoned.

It will be impossible to carry on this industry as it is now carried on if the duty is removed; and the men who are employed in the quarries and in the factories where the stone is dressed and in hauling the stone will be thrown out of employment, and this industry will be lost to the country, and money to the extent of many thousands of dollars will be carried out of the country.

No grindstones are made in my district, while very many of them are used; but I am in favor of protecting every American industry, and wish to enter my protest against placing grindstones on the free-list when stone is so abundant in this country and so suitable, and when labor will suffer a loss and business a misfortune by such a course.

I can not understand, Mr. Chairman, why it is that the gentlemen on the other side are so fearfully concerned in regard to hoarding up a few thousand dollars in the Treasury of the United States while they are not at all concerned in reference to sending money out of the country where it will be hoarded up in the treasuries of Europe. I would like to know if it is not just as harmful to the industries of this country to have a million dollars carried to London, to Liverpool, or to Manchester as it is to have that money locked up in the Treasury of the United States. It is just as much withdrawn from the channels of trade and the business of the country in the one case as it is in the other.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. The revenue from grindstones amounts to $5,529.54.

I do not think the admission of grindstones free of duty will make any especial difference here. I have not a doubt but what the grindstones from Ohio, of which my friend speaks, can be made cheaper there than anywhere else. I expect he will be able to send them everywhere throughout the United States. He need not have any fears that grindstones will come from anywhere else to crowd his grindstones out of the market. I hope we will have a vote on this proposition.

Mr. FARQUHAR. In the testimony taken before the last Morrison committee the Berea and Huron Stone Company of Ohio furnished, through Mr. FORAN, the Representative from Cleveland, quite an extended letter. By that letter I desire to call the attention of the House to a few paragraphs that cover this whole question of grindstones and also the export duty that is against American grindstones. I desire the Clerk to read the paragraphs I have marked, so that the House may have an intelligent idea of the grindstone trade.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the interest of the quarry owners of Ohio and the hundreds of workingmen employed in the quarries we desire to draw your attention to the following facts:

1. That there is essentially but little difference between a finished and unfinished grindstone. The latter are generally, to all intents and purposes, grindstones ready for use. All they lack is the eye through the center or a little smoothing off to finish them, which costs but a trifle. They were formerly shipped to this country in that shape simply for the purpose of evading the duty. There is no doubt that if unfinished grindstones are put upon the free-list no finished stones will ever be imported.

2. The bulk of the grindstones imported into this country are made in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and are used principally in the New England States. Even with the present duty upon them our rail rates are so high and the distance so great that we are obliged to make very low prices upon our stones to compete with those products.

3. The quantity of grindstones annually imported into this country from England is but a trifle. Nine-tenths of the imported stones come from the maritime provinces, as before stated. There are more grindstones consumed in the New England States than in all the balance of the country. Foreign grindstones being produced by cheap labor and brought there by water at low rates of freight, we are by the aid of the present tariff only enabled to get a fair share of that trade.

4. If grindstones are put upon the free-list the manufacturers of Ohio must abandon all the Eastern States to foreign stone, thus cutting off an annual shipment from here of many thousands of tons.

5. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick grindstones are of course free in their own country, but on every ton we ship into Canada we have to pay a duty of $2.

6. Mr. Mitchell claimed, when before the Ways and Means Committee, that foreign grindstones are absolutely required in large steel works. This is not correct. There may be, in the vicinity of Philadelphia, some steel works that use English stones, but we are positive that fully three-fourths of the steel manufacturers in the United States use Ohio grindstones. In fact, there is no class of grinding for which the various grits found in Ohio or Michigan are not adapted.

In conclusion, we wish to say that if grindstones of any kind are put upon the free-list the manufacturers of this State must either cut down quarrymen's wages sufficiently to offset the present duty or abandon the business in the Eastern States entirely.

The price of grindstones to-day is lower than was ever before known, which should satisfy the most skeptical that the present duty does not foster any monopoly.

Trusting that this matter will receive at your hands the attention which it deserves, we are,

Very truly, yours,

THE BEREA AND HURON STONE COMPANY.
GEO. H. WORTHINGTON, President.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered withdrawn.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I renew the pro forma amendment. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] who spoke last to the fact that it appears from the evidence that has just been read that the grindstones that are imported into this country are brought from the maritime provinces of Canada for use in the New England States. Very few indeed are brought from England. The reason why those stones of great weight are brought from the maritime provinces is not because they are cheaper, not because they are water-borne, and the freights are long, but because there is no other grindstone that has a grit that is suited for the manufacturers of New England. The grindstones of Ohio have a sharper and harder grit. They are entirely of a different quality. They may be used in steel-works or in iron-works, but they are not suitable for the cutlery manufacturers of Massachusetts and Connecticut. They have never been used there. The duty upon grindstones imported from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is merely a tax upon the manufacturers of Connecticut and Massachusetts in the cutlery interest.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that some of the stone in the northern part of Ohio is very soft, so soft that it can be used to hone a razor. It is a very superior quality of stone.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Yes; but where it is soft it is of uneven quality. I am glad the gentleman made the remark he did, because it reminds me to say that one of the necessities of the cutlery industry in these great grindstones that weigh a thousand pounds and upwards is equality of grit, and the difficulty with those Ohio stones is that while they are soft they have hard spots, so that they do not wear equally or run evenly upon the arbors upon which they are hung. The soft stones of Nova Scotia are the only ones that are fitted for the use of the cutlery manufacturers of New England, and in the interest of those manufacturers I ask that grindstones be put on the free-list, as they are not in competition with the industry of Ohio.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the testimony taken before the so-called Morrison committee and the testimony taken before the Tariff Commission in 1883 shows that the Berean grindstones will accomplish every purpose that the Nova Scotia or New Brunswick grindstones will accomplish, and that they are in every respect adequate to every task that can be put upon them. Therefore the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] is a mistake. That, I say, appears quite clearly, so far as the evidence is concerned. This is merely a question of whether the New England States can be benefited by grindstones being put upon the free-list. Now, that may possibly be. I stand here to-day not in defense of any local interest. With me the question of a tariff is not a local issue. I believe in protecting American industry in New England, in California, and in every intermediate locality. I find, however, that local influences do govern in regard to free trade and protection on the Democratic side. I find that in New England in Democratic localities it is demanded that for immediate local advantage they shall have free trade in this, that, and the other thing, but beyond that they want protection.

Now, I have no sort of respect for that intellectual idea, although I may have great respect for gentlemen who urge it, and as to the item under consideration, I stand here to-day to say that according to the best evidence on the subject there is not in the United States anywhere any need or requirement for grindstones that can not be supplied in the United States, and furthermore, let me say that I do not believe that the adoption of this provision of the bill would cheapen grindstones to New England. I withdraw the formal amendment.

The motion to strike out was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Curled hair, for beds or mattresses.

Mr. LODGE. I move to strike out that line. The horse-hair from which curled hair for beds and mattresses is made is largely imported into this country. It comes chiefly from South America, and is on the free-list. The curled hair that is affected by this clause is the result of labor applied in this country to the raw horse-hair, and the margin of profit in this industry is extremely narrow.

The wages paid in this country for making curled hair are nearly double those paid in the same industry abroad. The duty collected on curled hair last year amounted to $38.25 So that its removal is no relief to the Treasury. The effect of putting this article on the free-list, therefore, will be simply to strike a fatal blow at this industry, which is scattered through many of the Northern States; because, even with a reduction of wages, the domestic article could not probably be furnished at a sufficiently low price to enable it to compete with the imported product.

Sir, there is nothing, except, of course, "trusts" and "monopolies," which so much excites the virtuous and stormy eloquence of our friends on the other side as the question of the surplus. In this instance, however, the surplus is only affected to the amount of $38.25. Yet they propose to strike down a manufactured article which differs from the raw material purely in the labor which has been applied to it. The entire additional value of curled hair comes from the labor.

I utterly fail to see for what reason this is proposed. It is not a relief to the masses of the people; it does not relieve the necessaries of life; it does not reduce the surplus. Among the many items which we have touched in this bill I do not know that I have seen any which showed more decidedly the absolutely sectional and geographical character of the bill than this. I know this is a small industry; I know there is not much capital invested in it; there is no "trust" connected with it; but yet it affects a certain number of workingmen and American capitalists throughout the country and gives them employment and a reasonable living. The reason that they are selected as victims is because they are few in number and live for the most part in Northern States and Republican districts. It is all part of this same insincere and unfair policy which inspires this bill. For example, we have been told here to-day, with a burst of eloquence from the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, that it was our duty to put vegetables on the free-list; yet in that very speech he protested against any interpretation of the clause which would place potatoes on the free-list. If it is right to put vegetables on the free-list, why should there be a discrimination as to potatoes, a vegetable which enters probably more largely than any other into general consumption.

Again, a few minutes ago we heard pathetic addresses from the gentleman from Kentucky and other gentlemen on that side about the enormity of putting a "tax on knowledge." Why is knowledge sacred from taxation when embodied in the German, French, Greek, or Latin languages, while the tax is continued on English books? You continue the "tax on knowledge" when conveyed in the English language, the language of our country, but when "knowledge" comes in the shape of Greek, Latin, French, or German books you get up here and wail over the great hardship it would be if knowledge should continue to be taxed. The whole thing is a sham, a shallow device to catch votes, but you forget that you are trifling with the industrial life of the country. As a part of my remarks, I submit the following:

The Curled Hair Manufacturers of the United States, at a meeting held in the city of New York, on the 8th March, 1888, appointed a committee to prepare a suitable document to be presented to Congress, petitioning against the placing of "curled hair for beds or mattresses" on the free-list.

The committee, on behalf of themselves and their fellow manufacturers, desire to present to your honorable body the following reasons why the present duty of 20 per cent. on curled hair should be retained as now:

The raw horse hair used in our business is mostly imported from South America, which country is the greatest source of supply for these goods in the world. Freights from that point to Europe are somewhat cheaper than to this market. The wages paid by the curled-hair manufacturers in Europe are less than one-half the rates given in this country, while the freights between Europe and the United States are so low as to enable the manufacturers abroad to ship goods to this market at less rates than we can transport them a few hundred miles in this country.

The profits of our business for many years have been exceedingly close, there being no combination or "trust" among the manufacturers, and the removal of the present duty would enable the European manufacturers, who pay their laboring men so much less than we do, to destroy our industry, and would result in the closing up of our factories and throwing out of employment of a large number of men.

The ostensible object of the proposed tariff bill is to reduce the revenue, and we would respectfully call attention to the fact that the amount of duty received by the Government last year on the imports of curled hair was only $38.25.

Curled hair is used almost entirely by the wealthier classes, and the abolition of the duty would not therefore remove any burdens from the mass of the people. It would simply benefit the manufacturers of the article in Europe at the expense of those in our own country.

The free importation of curled hair from Europe would be dangerous to public health. A certain proportion of the raw hair gathered in Europe is of such character as to be likely to cause disease if made into curled hair. The Governments of Germany and Great Britain have appointed commissioners to investigate the matter, and their reports show the great danger that exists from this source. Any manufacturing done in this country is amenable to our laws, but what is done abroad is not subject to any authority here and can not be prevented by any means now known to us.

We feel that your purpose in making laws is to benefit the great body of the people and at the same time do nothing to destroy existing industries; we would therefore respectfully but earnestly petition that the duty on curled hair be allowed to remain as it is now.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. LODGE, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Human hair, raw, uncleaned, and not drawn.
Hatters' furs, not on the skin.

Mr. BYNUM. I move to strike out the line last read—"hatters' furs, not on the skin."

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman will tell us the reason for this amendment.

Mr. BYNUM. Gentlemen upon the other side have so repeatedly informed us of the complete destruction of American industries that will be wrought by the passage of this bill that we have become alarmed, and concluded that we must preserve some in order that manufacturing will not become a lost art. The production of hatters' furs will still live.

A MEMBER. Which district does this cover?

Mr. BYNUM. The entire State of Maine may depend upon it.

Mr. REED. That is as correct an answer as any gentleman on that side has made on this subject of the tariff. [Laughter.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hemp and rape seed, and other oil seeds of like character.
Lime.

Mr. BYNUM. I move to strike out the line last read—"lime."

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman will tell us the ground of this amendment.

Mr. BYNUM. The same ground as the other.

Mr. BRUMM. I would like to know what member you expect to whip into voting for the Mills bill by striking this article from the free-list.

Mr. BYNUM. I would be glad to enlighten the gentlemen on the other side as to this change, but the contract is too great; we have not time.

Mr. REED. I have asked these questions of the gentleman from Indiana to see whether we should have here a repetition of the proceedings in the Committee on Ways and Means. This is precisely the answer which was given—not by him, for I think he maintained total silence on all occasions—but I believe this was the answer given us regularly. We were either told that they did not know, or we received some answer which was not true. This is a specimen of the way in which this bill has been gotten up. Even the modifications which the gentlemen themselves now make in it, they give us no reasons for, because the reasons which they have are such as are not suitable for the light of day.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman has stated that my answers as to the changes proposed in the bill are but a repetition of the actions of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means when formulating the measure. I simply desire to say that the conduct of the gentleman from Maine during the consideration of this measure in the House is but a repetition of his actions in the committee during the consideration of the same. The House can judge as to the propriety of one and the justification of the other.

Mr. REED. Now, I want the House to review this matter with me. I have asked here the reasons why a certain act was proposed to be done—a public act concerning the public business, concerning the business interests of the country. This was my manner in the Committee on Ways and Means; and that it was a good, sensible, business-like manner, it is not necessary for me to say. The gentleman's manner was not to reply, or to answer with some trifling jeer. Now, which manner is most satisfactory upon a business question? The methods we see exhibited here on the other side, are the methods by which this bill affecting the business interests of the country is foisted by party whip and lash upon the people who are to be affected by it, without giving them any opportunity to discuss the question or to inform the committee, except by private interviews which these gentlemen do not dare to expose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. That is another of their methods; that is what they said in committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Garden seeds.
Linseed or flaxseed.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I move to strike out line 167—"linseed or flaxseed."

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I move to strike out that line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has submitted the motion to strike out line 167.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That amendment has the approbation of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] desire to speak?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I yield my time to my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention of the committee to an important and growing industry of this nation that has received but little attention in the discussion of the Mills bill. I refer to the linseed or flaxseed oil business. There are now in this country over $5,000,000 invested in operating over eighty linseed-oil mills, which are distributed from New York to Dakota.

In the Third Congressional district of Ohio over $1,000,000 are invested in this business. The present law protects the linseed-oil industry by a tariff of 25 cents per gallon upon all imported oil, and 20 cents per bushel on flaxseed. Under that protection the raising of flaxseed by our farmers has increased from an annual produce of 700,000 bushels to over 12,000,000, which crop finds a ready cash market from the linseed-oil mills at prices ranging from $1 to $1.25 per bushel, bringing to the pockets of the American farmers the sum of from twelve to fifteen million dollars each year.

The flaxseed crop to the American farmer is one of profit from the fact that the cost of said crop is comparatively light and the returns quick. The farmer sows his crop in April or May, and by the last of July or the first of August has his crop harvested and marketed, leaving the ground upon which it is raised in splendid condition for wheat. The proceeds of the crop come into the pocket of the farmer at a time when he has no other crop ready for market, and in addition to the sale of the seed the flax straw commands a ready market from $4 to $6 per ton.

The exports of linseed oil for the fiscal year ending June, 1887, is only 119,840 gallons, valued at $57,136. Thus it will be observed that the oil is nearly all consumed in the United States, and that the crop of flaxseed raised by the farmers of the United States increases in proportion to the demand of oil for home consumption. Now, throw open this growing industry to the markets of the world by placing flaxseed or linseed oil on the free-list. What will be the result? I send to the Clerk's desk three letters from parties engaged in the manufacture of linseed oil in Ohio, and request that they be read as a part of my remarks.

Those letters in clear, terse language tell what will become of over $5,000,000 of invested capital in mills and machinery for the manufacture of linseed oil, and the manufacture of linseed oil will cease to be an American industry.

Therefore by removing or reducing to a nominal sum the duty on linseed oil, you render it impossible for our oil-mills to compete with the oil-mills of England. The result must be the closing out of every oil-mill in the United States, or if they can continue in business it will be for the reason that free trade will enable the manufacturers to purchase flaxseed raised in India, where it is the second crop produced each year from the same ground, by labor that only costs 7 cents per day, at such a price that under the proposed reduction on oil they can compete with England; and the sure result will be that the burden and loss will fall on the farmer, and the heavy burden upon the Western farmer—the class of poor landless men who left their native homes in the crowded East and endured the hardships of a pioneer life in order that they might find homes and land for their children; for to the pioneer farmer of the Western prairies the flaxseed crop is the prime factor and chief dependence for success, both in subduing the virgin soil and in producing a crop quickly made and quickly marketed.

Place flaxseed upon the free-list in the name of revenue reform you will filch from the pockets of the American farmers from twelve to fifteen million dollars. What amount of revenue does the Government derive from the present duty on flaxseed? We now import flaxseed to the amount in value of $418,031.30, on which the duty is $83,060.81, and the duty on linseed-oil is $1,319.30; so that the revenue by the destruction of this industry would only be reduced $84,380.11, and for that pitiful reduction you will reduce the income of the farmers $15,000,000.

But we are told that the farmers must suffer and the linseed-oil industry be destroyed in order that the consumers will have cheaper oil. How stands the record of the past on that subject? In 1862 nearly all the linseed oil consumed in this country was imported, and the consumer paid for his oil from 90 cents to $1.20 per gallon. In 1870 the present tariff of 25 cents per bushel was placed on flaxseed and the manufacture of linseed oil largely increased, and the raising of flaxseed grew from 3,000,000 to 12,000,000 bushels. I desire to incorporate into my remarks a table prepared by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND], which shows that the flax crop of the United States in 1876 was 3,750,000 bushels, and that we imported 2,500,000 bushels, and that for the year 1887 our farmers produced 11,000,000 bushels and we imported 400,000 bushels.

Linseed oil in 1876 sold in the market at 80 cents per gallon; in 1888 at from 40 cents to 50 cents per gallon.

Therefore the theory of cheap oil to the consumer under free trade is contradicted by undisputed facts. I have not tried to explain the fallacy of your theory; I give the results of actual experience.

I ask the earnest consideration of the committee to this subject. The advocates of the Mills bill profess to be the special friends of the American farmers. How can you explain to the farmers of the great and growing West the necessity of destroying an industry worth $12,000,000 to the farmer in order to reduce the revenue of the Government $84,380.11? A policy that not only deprives the farmers of $12,000,000, but enriches the linseed capitalist of England at the expense of American citizens. And I am glad that the committee have concluded, in view of this great and growing industry, to permit the tariff on flaxseed to remain.

I append a few letters.

THE WOOD LINSEED OIL COMPANY,
Piqua, Ohio, March 19, 1888.

DEAR SIR: We presume it is hardly necessary to say to you that if the tariff was taken off of flaxseed or oil that every oil mill in the West (representing millions of capital) would be closed up; and that the item of seed raising, which has been increased in the United States under the present tariff from 700,000 bushels to more than 12,000,000 bushels, would be entirely cut off. Our farmers can not compete with free seed. The present tariff barely protects this great industry; and we trust you will use every effort in your power to have it remain as it is. We will forward you petitions before long.

Yours, very truly,

THE WOOD LINSEED OIL COMPANY.

Hon. ELI S. WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.

THE GRISWOLD LINSEED OIL COMPANY,
243 Superior Street, Cleveland, Ohio, April 13, 1888.

DEAR SIR: We wish to call your attention to the proposed change made by the Mills bill affecting import custom duty on linseed or flaxseed and linseed oil, placing both on the free-list. No change in the tariff could be so radical and unreasonable as this, in view of the simple argument which can not be gainsaid when the plain facts are considered governing the case. We have presumed that you, as a Representative from Ohio, will be willing to have attention called to this matter in brief, as follows:

We have in this country between 80 and 85 linseed-oil mills, representing a moneyed investment in machinery for working seed of $5,000,000 and over. These mills have sprung up, and the industry has grown to the extent that their capacity is sufficient to consume the entire production of flax grown in this country; and of late years the home production of seed by the farmer has increased along with the needs of the trade, so that little foreign seed is consumed here, as reference to the amount imported will readily show. In this country the seed is converted into oil and cake, the oil being the principal or prime factor, and is all consumed in the United States, and the cake is the refuse material, nearly all exported to England for feeding purposes. On the other hand, England works only Calcutta seed, raised in the East Indies, and the situation is then reversed, the manufacturer producing like products to our own, but upon an entirely different basis—their prime object being to obtain the cake for feeding, and the oil becomes the secondary product. It can therefore be readily seen that under the proposed change the entire basis of this manufacturing industry will be transferred to England, thus leaving our mills powerless and worthless, with no chance whatever to compete with them, as the production of seed in America would be entirely cut off, and we could not import seed and work it in competition with England. We give below the distribution of the mills by States:

Ohio	21	Pennsylvania	8
Indiana	7	Minnesota	3
Illinois	12	Wisconsin	3
Iowa	11	Michigan	1
Missouri	4	New York	7
Kansas	2
Nebraska	1	Total	81
Dakota	1

How could these mills expect to work seed imported from the East Indies (virtually England), paying freight from the seaboard to their different points, and export the cake, and at the same time successfully compete with English oil in this country and cake in their own. Our mills, it would seem, would become valueless, and it certainly would appear unjust to our manufacturers to wipe out their investment of capital for which nothing could be realized. As the matter stands with this change, no reduction of revenue, to speak of, would come, the only thing it would accomplish would be to wipe out completely this industry. Clearly this should not be done by Congress; at least, it should not be considered until Congress is prepared to reimburse the mill owners for the investments now represented by their machinery and buildings; that would relieve the surplus to a considerable extent, while the proposed change in the tariff would not.

A careful study of this matter will, we feel confident, show you the evil resulting, without any good.

Very respectfully,

THE GRISWOLD LINSEED OIL COMPANY,
A. P. HOUSE, Vice-President.

Hon. E. S. WILLIAMS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

PIQUA, OHIO, June 4, 1888.

DEAR SIR: We see by reports from Congress that amendments to the proposed Mills revenue bill will be in order soon. This being so, permit us to call your attention to the industry in which we are engaged as manufacturers of linseed-oil. Under the present tariff flaxseed has a protection of 20 cents per bushel and linseed-oil 25 cents per gallon. By the Mills bill flaxseed is free and linseed-oil (under pressure from the seaboard crushers) has 10 cents per gallon. The growing of seed in this country, without some protection from the cheap-labor seed of the East Indies, we think would be impossible, for the reason that the manufacturers find it very difficult to get a supply now, and would be entirely unable to get it if it was not the fact that it is considered a good crop for fresh-broken ground on the prairie of the extreme West and Northwest. Older farmers have almost abandoned it as a profitable crop in competition with wheat, corn, oats, barley, etc. Therefore should the duty be removed the American manufacturers would be sacrificed, and we think without benefit to the consumer.

The linseed-oil interest occupies an entirely different position in America from what it does in England. We manufacture oil for consumption, the cake being incidental and having to seek a market abroad for a large per cent. of it. While in England they manufacture for the cake, which is used largely for feeding and fertilizing purposes, oil being incidental. An English manufacturer buys his seed from the cheap lands of the India possession, manufactures it into cake and oil, the relative quantity being about 65 per cent. of the cake and 35 per cent. of oil. For the 65 per cent. he has the market, having to seek a market for only a portion of his 35 per cent.

In America the manufacturer has a market for the 35 per cent. and has to seek a market for a large portion of the 65 per cent. Now, if you take the duty from seed the American farmers refuse to grow it, and greatly so for the reason that the English manufacturer can throw his surplus 35 per cent. into the American market. Knowing full well if he can destroy the American-grown, he will ultimately have control of the American markets, as it would be impossible for the American manufacturers to import seed from India and then pay the increased cost of transportation on the cake, which must go back to England for a market. Having then effectually ruined the American grower, and through him the interior manufacturer, competition is virtually destroyed, and the English manufacturer advances his price on the 35 per cent. which he has to dispose of, and the American consumer has to pay the advance whether he wants to or not. We, therefore, under the existing facts, ask you to use your influence to keep the duty on foreign seed and oil, where it now is. Feeling fully assured that the price of oil will always be kept as low as it should be by the active competition of the American manufacturers.

Yours, respectfully,

THE W. P. ORR LINSEED OIL COMPANY,
Piqua, Ohio.

Per H. L. POPE & CO.,

Hon. E. S. WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. KERR. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is it an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What is the effect of it?

Mr. REED. The effect of it is to give him five minutes. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is a formal one to strike out the last word.

Mr. KERR. That is it. It is the line in the Mills bill providing that linseed or flaxseed shall be put upon the free-list. That line is indorsed by the Democratic party at the St. Louis convention. [Laughter.] The Democratic committee and the Democratic side of the House for some reason have seen proper to go back on that part of the Democratic platform. I do not know why it is, except it be the motion has been made by a Democratic member from Minnesota, who may think it conducive to his interest. [Laughter.]

I have received numbers of petitions and numbers of letters from my district in favor of striking out this provision. I am glad Democratic necessity has made it necessary. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. HARMER. I move to strike out the last two words.

I send to the Clerk's desk to be read within my time a protest against the passage of the Mills bill, signed by over eight hundred manufacturers of the city of Philadelphia and vicinity, representing 150,000 employés.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Honorable the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

1. In selecting taxes for removal, the direct internal taxes, laid solely upon our own people, should be stricken off, rather than the indirect customs taxes, laid wholly or in part upon foreigners.

2. The maintenance of two costly methods of collecting revenue where but one is necessary is indefensible. Of the methods now employed, the customs service must be permanent. The other method should at once be abolished and the cost of it saved.

3. The protective principle embodied in the laws by the founders of this Government and maintained by the votes of the people for nearly one hundred years, should include in its benefits every American producer, whether of so-called raw material or of manufactured articles. All raw material when ready for market is, like the completed fabric, the fruit of labor, and labor is the thing protected.

4. The American market consumes annually more than $7,000,000,000 worth of articles manufactured at home. In addition, it consumed last year $350,000,000 worth of fabrics made abroad which could have been made here. These figures show it to be the greatest and richest market in the world; and they prove that its domestic manufactures, being still within its capacity to consume, have ample room for expansion without seeking foreign markets. To open the American market further to foreigners, while no foreign market is further opened to us, will be to surrender the richest commercial prize in the world without compensation.

5. Industries which produce $7,000,000,000 a year under a system proved by a century of experience to be conducive to national prosperity, represent interests of too vast importance for employers and employed, and for the people at large, to be made the subject of loose experiment. No general reconstruction of the tariff law, involving disturbance of the commerce of the entire country, should be undertaken, unless in response to the wish of the people plainly expressed at the polls, and the people have not expressed such a wish.

6. Any reconstruction of the tariff law should be based upon a system of specific rather than ad valorem duties, for the reason that the latter offer greater facility for the perpetration of the frauds which even now rob the Government of large sums of money every year.

As the tariff bill prepared by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, and commonly known as the Mills bill, is constructed in complete disregard of all the conditions of safety, equity, and prosperity for the American people indicated by the above propositions, we, the undersigned manufacturers of the city of Philadelphia and vicinity, do most earnestly protest against its approval by Congress.

Mr. HARMER. The signers of this protest are gentlemen who have made Philadelphia the greatest manufacturing city in the United States, and also made it the city of homes, largely owned and paid for by the wage-earners under protection.

Mr. BURROWS. Has line 166 been stricken out?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. We have passed it and we are now on line 167.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next line, which is line 168.

The Clerk read as follows:

Marble of all kinds, in block, rough or squared.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I move to strike out that.

Mr. BURROWS. On that motion I desire to be heard. When lines 165, 166 were reached, the reading was so rapid I lost the opportunity to make the motion in regard to line 166. I am quite sure if the committee will listen to what is said on that industry of garden seeds, they will unanimously agree to return to it and strike that line out. There was no information furnished to the committee on that subject we are aware of, but when the Tariff Commission was investigating the subject a large number of witnesses brought before that commission testified in regard to it. I have a short extract from the testimony taken and from a large number of witnesses, and only one suggested garden seeds should be free. I ask the Clerk to read this, and then I will ask unanimous consent to return to that line with the view to strike it out.

The Clerk read as follows:

GARDEN SEEDS.

D. Landreth & Sons, Philadelphia, say:

"This industry requires use of 30,000 acres of land, gives employment to thousands of people both in fields and in workshops. The pauper labor of Europe comes in competition. England's humid climate permits a larger yield, although the seed has not so much power as our own."

C. C. Morse, California, says:

"The seed-growing business in California is a new one, not more than eight years old, but this year (1882) we supplied the Eastern market with not less than 60 tons of garden seeds. We need protection anyway until we are stronger. We have not only European competition against us, but high freights. The vegetables of to-day are much better than those of fifty years ago, and improvement in next ten years will be very great."

Mr. Wells, of Connecticut, said: "I represent the seed farms of New England, near Wethersfield, where there are at least thirty seed-growing farms. We have been in this business for some time, and have buildings, etc., for carrying on this business properly; but the influx of foreign seeds of an inferior quality is driving us out. We have to compete, for instance, with turnip-seed, which they bring in at 10 cents a pound, while we can not grow it for less than 20 cents.

Mr. BURROWS. In view of that statement I ask unanimous consent to make a motion to strike out the line indicated.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

Mr. BURROWS. So I supposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will assume the pro forma amendment to be withdrawn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The gentleman offered no pro forma amendment. My motion was to strike out that line, 168.

Mr. HOUK. I hope the House will agree to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to strike out the line he proposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the House will.

Mr. HOUK. To keep this item in the bill would destroy an industry which employs several thousand men in my own county; and with free marble it is a notorious fact that American marble can not compete with foreign. I hope the motion will prevail.

The motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, to strike out the line was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Osier or willow, prepared for basket-makers' use.
Broom-corn.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I move to strike out line 170, "broom-corn."

I am entirely unable to understand, Mr. Chairman, why broom-corn should be placed upon the free-list when it is a product of almost all parts of our country. Wherever corn can be grown broom-corn can be also. It can be produced in most of the States of the Union.

The Democratic caucus, or the Ways and Means Committee, has decreed that lime shall be restored to the dutiable-list, when it is not found in all parts of the country by any means, but is only found in certain localities. There are some States or parts of States where no limestone is found, and other States where very little is found. They have also restored to the dutiable-list linseed or flaxseed, which are only produced in certain localities.

They have also restored to the dutiable-list marble of all kinds in block, rough, or squared, which is largely a Southern production, and I am unable to see why there should be this discrimination against broom-corn. It is an agricultural product and is produced almost every place, and can be produced in the greatest abundance in this country, and can be grown cheaply as well as in abundance, and can be grown wherever any farm product can be grown, and should be protected. And yet it is to go on the free-list, while some influence has been brought to bear to restore the articles which I have just named, though they, like broom-corn, have been on the free-list until now.

Some Democratic district was imperiled, the return of some Democratic member was endangered, and the changes were accordingly made; but broom-corn is to go, as it is not a panacea for the evils feared on the other side of the House. The fact that it is an agricultural product, and the fact that it grows in all parts of the country and is produced largely by poor people makes no difference in this House.

This industry is an extensive one, and if it is to be prejudiced by the importation of broom-corn from Canada or Cuba, or any other foreign country, as it will be if placed upon the free-list, many poor people, as well as those who are not poor, will feel the effects.

I do not understand why it is to be brought here from Canada, or Cuba, or South America in competition with our American product, and I fail to see any reason for it which could possibly justify such action. Every dollar that is sent out of the country for broom-corn is so much drawn from the channels of trade unnecessarily, and we are just that much poorer. I have no interest in this industry beyond the fact that it is an American industry and should be protected. We are all interested in every American industry, and should be on the alert to see that no man or woman or child should be robbed of an opportunity to labor by giving employment to foreigners which we should give to our own people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means if there ever was before a duty on broom-corn?

Mr. MILLS. I am inclined to think there was not; but there has never been any imported.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I can not find it in any official schedule, either on the free-list, on the list of sundries, or on the dutiable-list.

Mr. MILLS. None is imported. Therefore it ought to be on the free-list. The committee believed it to be proper to place it there, and I ask that we have a vote upon the pending proposition.

Mr. CANNON. What is the pending motion?

The CHAIRMAN. To strike out line 170—"broom-corn."

Mr. CANNON. Then, if broom-corn is stricken out, so far as the action of the committee is concerned, it will not be upon the free-list?

Mr. MILLS. Of course.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I would like to ask another question as to the present tax upon it.

Mr. MILLS. There is none imported.

Mr. CANNON. But what does the law provide that it shall pay if it is imported?

Mr. MILLS. It is not enumerated at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. It doubtless has a duty fixed in the unenumerated clauses of the bill—some basket clause.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, in some basket clause.

Mr. CANNON. Then what is it taxed under some general clause?

Mr. DINGLEY. Twenty per cent. under the basket clause.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Maine says 20 per cent.

Mr. MILLS. It would doubtless come under the provision:

There shall be levied, collected, and paid on the importation of all raw or unmanufactured articles not herein enumerated or provided for a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. CANNON. Ten per cent.?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. And your action is to leave it as it is under the law?

Mr. MILLS. No, to put it on the free-list.

Mr. CANNON. The motion then came from that side?

Mr. MILLS. No, the motion came from your side to strike it off the free-list.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to be heard upon that motion.

I make a pro forma amendment as it may be necessary in order to obtain the floor.

From the statement of the gentleman from Texas the tax upon broom-corn imported is now 10 per cent. ad valorem. He says none is imported. Very well, then, what harm can it do to let it remain as it is under the law?

I want to state, further, that substantially two-thirds, as I understand it, from one-half to two-thirds, of all the broom-corn produced here is produced in the district I have the honor to represent. I understand further that almost all the remainder produced in this country comes from Kansas, with some small portion from Nebraska.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. A considerable amount is produced in the State of New York.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. And in Ohio.

Mr. CANNON. And a considerable amount, I am informed, is raised in New York and also in Ohio. I understand that it can be produced in Canada.

And yet 10 per cent. is sufficient to prevent the importation of broom-corn. This is purely an agricultural product. Gentlemen who understand it, understand that great labor has to be expended in its production, not only in preparing the ground, in seeding and in the cultivation, but the labor is enormous in harvesting and preparing for the market. In fact, so far as that is concerned the product may be said to be represented by more than four-fifths of labor. So I trust the gentleman will allow the motion to prevail and let broom-corn stand as it now does, with a tax of 10 per cent. ad valorem, which he informs us is the tax.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, one of the most distinguished Secretaries of the Treasury our country ever had, Mr. Walker, lays down among the principles to guide in the formation of a tariff bill this: That where an article bears a very low duty, and the importation is very small, or it is not imported at all, the article ought to be transferred to the free-list. We have put this article on the free-list, finding no importation of it at all even under this nominal duty. Besides that, we have reduced the duty on the manufactured product. We all know enough about the manufacture to know brooms are made out of broom-corn. We have reduced the duty on brooms and put broom-corn on the free-list. My friend says they raise it in his district. I suppose that is true of almost every district in the country. I know they raise it in my district. The very fact that none is imported into the country, I think, ought to be accepted as sufficient proof to all of us that we produce it cheaper than it can be produced by anybody abroad and sold in our neighborhood in competition with us.

Mr. CANNON. What will be the effect of leaving the duty as it is?

Mr. MILLS. There will be no effect at all to your part of the country, and perhaps to no other part of the country.

Mr. CANNON. Then, as it has been said the farmer has no place in this bill, we would much rather——

Mr. MILLS. The prosperity of the farmer does not depend on broom-corn.

Mr. CANNON. As the gentleman says it will do no harm, we would much rather have the duty remain as it is.

Mr. MILLS. Let us vote. It is too small a matter to talk about.

The Chair put the question, and was in doubt as to the result.

Mr. CANNON. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 82.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. I challenge the count.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 83.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Brush-wood.
Plaster of Paris, when ground or calcined.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out line 172.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rags, of whatever material composed.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to strike out that line. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means if the sole effect of this line is not simply to admit free of duty woolen rags, which now pay 10 per cent?

Mr. MILLS. Rags, of whatever material composed.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the sole effect of this line is to admit free of duty woolen rags, which now pay a duty of 10 per cent.

Mr. BRUMM. To admit woolen rags and yellow fever.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is to be borne in mind that this practically affects the wool question, because woolen rags imported into this country and worked here in the form of shoddy take the place of wool to a large extent, and furnish one of the means by which the price of wool has been largely crowded down.

Now if it is proposed to put wool upon the free-list, woolen rags, of course, should follow in the same direction. But if it is not proposed to put wool upon the free-list, then woolen rags should not be put upon the free-list but should retain the same duty that they have at present, competing, as they do in so material an extent, with the use of wool. I would therefore suggest to the gentleman from Texas that by unanimous consent we pass over this line until we shall have reached and determined the question of wool.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that this line may be passed for the present.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not see the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee present, but I noticed the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr.

BRECKINRIDGE], who is on that committee. I will say to that gentleman what I said a moment ago, thinking the chairman of the committee was present, that if wool is put on the free-list, then of course woolen rags ought to be, but if wool is not put on the free-list woolen rags should not be. My question was whether the committee would not consent to pass over this line until wool is disposed of.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I heard the gentleman's remark and consulted with the chairman of the committee (who has been called out), and he objected to passing over this line.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then I hope that the motion which I have made that this line be stricken out may be adopted, for this is simply the preliminary contest with reference to the question of free wool. My belief is that one of the most ruinous acts which this Congress could perform would be the placing of wool upon the free-list—ruinous not simply to the farmers who produce wool in this country, but ruinous in the long run to the consumer, resulting eventually in increasing rather than decreasing the cost of woolen cloth to the consumer. Now, as this is the preliminary step in the matter, and the question practically is to be determined here, for woolen rags should not be put upon the free-list unless wool is to be, I hope that this House will meet the question at this point and determine whether it is to be the policy of the majority to put wool upon the free-list, as this bill proposes, in which case, of course, woolen rags would follow.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, in 1866 this question of free woolen rags was under debate in this House in connection with the question of the making of shoddy. It was not proposed at that time to put wool upon the free-list, and I send to the Clerk's desk an extract from the debate giving the remarks of one of the present members of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], from which it will be seen that even if wool were not to be put upon the free-list, which is altogether an idle supposition at this time—that even if it were not to be put upon the free-list, yet very weighty authority upon the other side of the House then held that nevertheless woolen rags should be put upon the free-list. I ask the Clerk to read the extract which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

July 28, 1866.

Mr. KELLEY. Let the raw material come in. Let us make blankets that will drive out English blankets. Let us make our own "English frieze" and "Peterboro' frosted beaver." Let us be able to rival England and France and other representative nations in making these cloths.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Now, Mr. Chairman, this was about woolen rags, and it is true now as then that if anything is raw material I suppose it is old rags.

And upon the question of raw material I wish to have read an extract from the remarks of Mr. DAWES showing how different were the views entertained by gentlemen upon the other side of the House at that time from those entertained there now.

The Clerk read as follows:

June 29, 1866.

Mr. DAWES. The duty must be levied on the raw material or on the manufactured article. If you levy it on the raw material you discriminate against American labor, and if you levy it on the manufactured article you discriminate in favor of American labor. You must have either a protective tariff or a tariff which discriminates against American labor.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I submit, sir, that it is nothing less than mockery for this same class of gentlemen to now claim, when we are trying to do what they said until the recent past was best for labor, that we shall lessen wages. Your party has taken a new departure. You are the Chinese party of monopoly.

Mr. ADAMS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. ADAMS. The amendment pending is to strike out the line. I move to amend the line by striking out the last three words and inserting in lieu thereof the word "cotton."

A MEMBER. Cotton rags are on the free-list.

Mr. ADAMS. Well, I make the motion merely for the purpose of submitting a few remarks. By the existing law I find——

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield so that I may make a motion that the committee rise, in order to let the Committee on Appropriations present a bill.

Mr. ADAMS assented.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] having the floor, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to make the motion indicated by him.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLOUNT having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with the action of the Senate thereon, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, June 26, 1888.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker pro tempore appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FORNEY, Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. CANNON.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to a privileged motion. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the agricultural appropriation bill, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10233) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, ought not these amendments to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They must take that course if a point of order be made.

Mr. ADAMS. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] will state the purport of these amendments, I shall probably make no point of order.

Mr. HATCH. There is no necessity that the amendment should go to the Committee of the Whole. The two principal amendments—the only ones on which there will be any controversy—will come before the House at the proper time. One of these proposes to appropriate $100,000 for additional sugar experiments—a matter that the House committee considered as closed with the last report, and a matter for which no appropriation was asked by the Commissioner of Agriculture in the Book of Estimates. The other of these amendments proposes an appropriation of $25,000 for an agricultural experiment station, somewhere out in the Northwest. This is proposed just after we have established an experiment station in every State and Territory where there is an agricultural college.

Mr. ADAMS. May I ask the gentleman whether he is in favor of concurring or non-concurring, and if so, why?

Mr. HATCH. My motion is to non-concur in the Senate amendments, and let them go to a conference committee. When the conference report is presented, the House can take a vote upon the question. If the gentleman wants my individual opinion, I have no hesitation in the world in giving it to him.

Mr. ADAMS. That is the only opinion I can get now.

Mr. HATCH. I have voted for every appropriation for these sugar experiments down to a point where every single man connected with the matter said that every dollar that was necessary had been appropriated. Not only that, the committee authorized and instructed me to say upon the floor on their behalf that they would ask no further appropriation for this purpose.

I did make that statement a year ago. These experiments have gone as far as the Commissioner himself can find anything to experiment upon, except that you can take $100,000 of the people's money and throw it into the pockets of some favored man who happens to have a sugar manufactory situated somewhere in some favored district. That is all there is in the matter.

Mr. ADAMS. With the exception of those two amendments there is nothing substantial involved.

Mr. HATCH. The others are small amendments, cutting down or raising a salary here and there; they amount to nothing substantial.

Mr. ADAMS. I make no point of order.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the previous question on my motion that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. HATCH was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BELMONT. I rise to make a privileged motion—that the House agree to the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the Senate and House upon the bill (H. R. 6833) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year 1889. The report is at the desk. I ask that it be laid before the House. I desire to move that the report be agreed to and that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendment numbered 16, and ask a further conference with the Senate on that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6833) "making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year 1889," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 17, 22, 23, 24, 25, and 31.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 19, 20, 21, 26, 27, 28, 29, and 30, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out from said amendment the words "and consul-general;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the sum named in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof $378,500; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: As to amendment numbered 16 the committee of conference has been unable to agree.

PERRY BELMONT,
JAMES B. McCREARY,
WM. W. MORROW,
Managers on the part of the House.
EUGENE HALE,
W. B. ALLISON,
JAS. B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement was subsequently furnished to accompany the report:

The managers on the part of the House submit the following statement, to accompany the report:

The principal amendments made by the Senate, in which the House managers concurred, change the rank of several of the foreign missions, without increasing the salaries, and provide for two additional secretaries of legation. The conferees have been unable to agree upon the provision for an expedition to explore and report upon the resources of the Congo Basin, and ask for a further conference.

PERRY BELMONT,
JAS. B. McCREARY,
WM. W. MORROW,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] state what the sixteenth amendment is?

Mr. BELMONT. The sixteenth amendment provides for an appropriation of $25,000 for a commission to explore the Congo Basin and report upon its products and commercial capabilities. The Senate insists upon that amendment; we desire to insist upon our disagreement, and ask a further conference.

Mr. BURROWS. Is there any statement furnished by the House conferees in connection with this report?

Mr. BELMONT. I can give it verbally.

Mr. BURROWS. But I understood this was a conference report.

Mr. BELMONT. It is the conference report as agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. BURROWS. But there are certain amendments of which we desire to know the effect.

Mr. BELMONT. I will state to the House——

Mr. BURROWS. The rules require that a written statement be submitted by the House conferees to accompany the conference report.

Mr. BELMONT. Do I understand that the gentleman insists upon a written statement?

Mr. BURROWS. The rules require it. I will, however, waive the demand if the gentleman will state the matters in issue between the two Houses.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the gentleman from New York have leave to file that statement hereafter.

Mr. BURROWS. Of course the report as read by the Clerk that certain amendments designated by number are agreed to, and certain others disagreed to, does not convey any information.

Mr. BELMONT. I will repeat the statement which I made at the time of the ordering of the conference. There have been comparatively few and unimportant changes made by the Senate. The amendments we have agreed to raise the rank of ministers-residents to that of envoys without increase of salaries. There are some changes by the Senate in regard to Mexican consulates. Some of these strongly commended themselves to the House conferees, particularly the transfer of the consulate-general from Matamoros to Nuevo Laredo. But others could not be adopted without doing injustice, and the result of the conference was that all the proposed changes were abandoned, the Senate conferees desiring to either have all the changes retained or none. So, in this respect, the bill is now as it passed the House.

Mr. ADAMS. Has the House considered these amendments, or were they by unanimous consent sent to conference?

Mr. BELMONT. They were sent to conference by unanimous consent, after a statement such as I have already made in reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. ADAMS. Did the House consider the Senate amendments?

Mr. BELMONT. After a statement made in the House they were sent to a conference committee.

Mr. ADAMS. A conference was ordered by unanimous consent, according to a practice which the gentleman knows, I suppose.

Mr. SPINOLA. I move by unanimous consent the time of the session be extended five minutes, so we may dispose of this matter.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan insist on the point of order?

Mr. BURROWS. I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was adopted.

Mr. BELMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BELMONT. In accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], I will add a written statement to accompany the report.

CONFEREES APPOINTED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the agricultural bill, Mr. HATCH, Mr. DAVIDSON of Alabama, and Mr. CONGER.

The hour of 5 o'clock p. m. having arrived (in accordance with the previous order), the House adjourned.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate resume consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business that order is closed; and the Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HAWLEY to add the following additional sections to the bill:

SEC. 3. For the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for an army gun factory for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance, to be erected at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., in accordance with the recommendation of the Gun Foundry Board of February 16, 1884, $750,000.

SEC. 4. For the purchase of rough-finished, oil-tempered, and annealed steel for high-power coast-defense guns of 8, 10, and 12 inch caliber, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection at each stage of the manufacture, and including all the parts of each caliber, $5,000,000: Provided, That no money shall be expended except for steel accepted and delivered.

SEC. 5. The material for the guns provided for in section 4 shall be purchased in accordance with section 3709, Revised Statutes, for which purpose the Secretary of War is authorized to make contracts with responsible steel manufacturers, after proper advertisement, continuing not less than thirty days, in the newspapers most likely to reach the said manufacturers: Provided, That each bidder with whom such contracts shall be made shall agree to erect in the United States a suitable plant, including the best modern appliances, capable of making all the steel required, and of finishing it in accordance with the contracts, and shall further agree to deliver yearly a specified quantity of each caliber, the time of the delivery of the steel for the smaller calibers of heavy guns to commence at the expiration of not more than eighteen months, and that for the largest calibers specified in the advertisement at the expiration of not more than three years from the date of the acceptance of the contracts; and that all the material for said guns shall be manufactured in the United States.

SEC. 6. For the purchase of submarine mines, for needful casemates, cable galleries, and appliances to operate submarine mines; for continuing torpedo experiments, and for practical instruction of engineer troops in the details of torpedo service, $500,000.

SEC. 7. For the purchase of submarine controllable torpedoes or torpedoes and torpedo-boats controllable from shore and adapted to coast defense, $100,000.

SEC. 8. The appropriations provided for in sections 3, 4, 6, and 7 shall be available until expended.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, my objection to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is based upon the fact that this is not the proper time nor the proper bill for the consideration of the question presented by that amendment. I regret exceedingly that he has offered the amendment. I made the point of order against it and I oppose it now, not because I am opposed to a sufficient appropriation to begin the great work of constructing heavy ordnance, but because I believe that this is not the proper bill nor time to consider that question, nor do I believe that the terms of the amendment are sufficiently guarded to protect the interests of the Government in beginning the manufacture of heavy ordnance in a Government shop.

The terms and conditions and restrictions under which we shall begin this work on a large scale have been a subject of consideration for the last twenty years, and I believe there is scarcely an exception among those who have considered it, outside of the officers of the Ordnance Department, that the system proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is vicious and will result in disaster. To appropriate $6,350,000 in addition to that which is provided for in the general appropriation bill, making in all over $7,000,000, and to place the expenditure of that entire amount in the hands of the Ordnance Department, would, I think, as has been the case with every other government that has attempted to manufacture arms in the same way, become extravagant, corrupt, and bad, and be without satisfactory results in the end.

The history of the manufacture of heavy ordnance shows that there have been three systems: One for the Government itself to manufacture these guns; the second, for the Government to enter into partnership with private individuals; and the third, to rely alone upon private enterprise for the manufacture.

We must be guided by the experience of the world in this matter. In the consideration of the question by the Committees on Appropriations on the fortifications bill, upon which this question was to be considered and has always been considered, the great controversy has been from the Fortieth Congress until now as to the exact mode of utilizing the appropriation when made. Congress has never at any time heretofore attempted to engraft upon the Army appropriation bill a provision of this character, but has considered it wise to place it alone upon the fortifications bill, where it should be considered and where all the conditions that Congress in its wisdom thought proper might be imposed. The Senator from Connecticut by his amendment proposes to place the whole $6,350,000 in the hands of the Ordnance Department, to be disposed of as they see proper.

Let us see what has been the result of the systems that I have indicated elsewhere. In the report of Sir H. Bessemer and Professor Osborne Reynolds to the English Parliament they take up the case of the Woolwich arsenal, where the government has manufactured its own guns, and they come to the conclusion that the government itself can not make guns properly, with economy and efficiency. They say, in their report, of their very best government shop, Woolwich, a miniature of which the Senator proposes we shall have without the safeguards which are thrown around the English shop:

> We believe that the defects in our own system of ordnance arise, and are likely to have undue continuance from the absence of independent criticism, and in consequence of the technical advisers of the government being the same persons as those who either are or have been in charge of the manufactories responsible for these defects. We believe there are in existence several systems of ordnance superior to the Woolwich system, but that these have not had fair trial in this country because of the jealousy of the technical advisers of the government in favor of our own system. This jealousy has caused an undue resistance not only to the adoption of better ordnance, but also to the reception of true theoretical principles of gunnery and the construction of ordnance.

Rear-Admiral Simpson says in his report of the plan of financially involving the Government in a joint operation with private parties:

> The experiences in England and Russia are very instructive and warn against the adoption of such a system. In England the government, in addition to paying during several years very high prices for articles delivered, was forced to pay £65,000 to close an agreement, while the company, besides the profits in manufacture, came into possession of a complete working plant at a mere nominal valuation.
> In Russia the government finds itself involved with a stock company, paying excessive prices for what it receives, and discovers no way of relief except by buying up shares and operating the establishment as a government foundry.

Of the third method, that of giving the entire contract to private works, splendid examples of success are found in the establishments of Krupp and Sir William Armstrong. They supply guns, complete, to all parts of the world. Still, serious objections are made to sole reliance upon this method, which are thus stated by the Simpson board:

> As an example of depending almost entirely on private works, Germany is a perfect instance. The works of Mr. Krupp are practically the sole source of supply of the government artillery. In such a case the government must be the slave of the corporation and subject to its whims, caprices, and conveniences. It needs no argument to show the dependent condition of the government under such a rule; it might prove a source of the greatest embarrassment. The board is well informed that ten or eleven years ago the artillery officers were very restive under this load and were making strenuous efforts to be relieved from it, but without success. It is hardly to be supposed that time has quieted the feelings of dissatisfaction.

After the examination of these reports and a thorough consideration of this whole question it was practically the unanimous opinion of Congress that you could neither build ships of war constructed of steel nor make guns of great power unless you had the two systems combined by throwing open to the inventive genius of the country an opportunity to build ships in competition with the Government, and making the steel of which these guns are to be constructed and assembling and finishing them and making them complete, subject to a test by the officers of the Government in competition with the Government establishments.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not quite hear. May I ask what Government the Senator is speaking of now?

Mr. GORMAN. I spoke of the Russian Government, where they relied upon contracts alone, and I read from Commodore Simpson's report upon that subject.

Mr. President, let us go back for a moment. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], whom I see in his seat on the opposite side of the chamber, has had practical experience and knowledge of these affairs. You had not in 1880 any Government officers of sufficient knowledge and experience to design a vessel of power and speed; you had not the facilities in your navy-yards to build one, nor was there more than a single private contractor who would undertake to produce the steel for a vessel of war. You were compelled to make contracts for the entire construction of the hulls and the machinery with the one man who was the pioneer in all this business in this country, a man of force, a man of energy, a man of great will-power and intense patriotism, who was ahead of his time. I refer to the late John Roach, one of the greatest men that we have had within our borders in half a century. He was ahead of all the naval officers and the officers of the Ordnance Department, having energy and skill and bravery enough to establish the first plant of any magnitude within the United States. He constructed the first great vessel that you had.

The plant which he established upon the Delaware made it possible for us to obtain and improve the machinery for the purpose of making great guns. But because he was the only man whose genius and enterprise had taken him far in advance of the scientific men in the ordnance branches of both departments of this great Government, by the rivalry and the enmity between naval boards and bureau chiefs and the criticism of mere theorists he was destroyed.

As we advanced a step further Congress, without any consideration of political questions, as there are no politics in it to-day, said that this defect of having the Government to rely exclusively upon a private concern is destructive to individual enterprise and bad for the Government; so the last Congress made ample provision not only for the purpose of contracting with individual firms and corporations to make the steel for your armored vessels and to make steel for the great guns up to 10 and 12 inches, but the Ordnance Department of the Navy, by direction of the Secretary of the Navy, selected the yard here at Washington as the great shop for completing and assembling the guns that were to be made out of the rough steel furnished by private enterprise.

The result of the policy was that not only Mr. Roach's ship-yard, but Crump's, at Philadelphia, a firm in Baltimore, and another one in San Francisco and the great firms at Wilmington came forward and made bids for the construction of the great war-vessels. You have competition among themselves, and you had the navy-yards of Norfolk and New York prepared to do the work, and they are now constructing two of the great engines of war which the last Congress provided for. You have been going on in the most satisfactory way, both to the Government and to the contractors, until to-day you are approaching the construction of the best vessels in the world.

Here you have the best possible conditions; the skill and genius of the best constructors upon the Pacific and the Atlantic pitted against your naval engineers and constructors. Our officers know that the world is looking forward to compare the result of their work as to cost, speed, and durability with the two great engines of war to be constructed at the Norfolk and New York yards and with vessels being built by private establishments, by Crump, and at San Francisco and Baltimore.

Not only this, Mr. President, but this policy has had the effect of increasing the plants of the great works at Bethlehem, Midvale, and other places. Within 40 miles of this Capitol that legislation has had the tendency to establish (indeed it was the immediate cause of the beginning of the establishment) great steel works on the Patapsco (Steelton) within 5 miles of the city of Baltimore, which is to be the greatest establishment in the world. Selecting a point on the shores of the Chesapeake as barren and uninviting as the plains, but a point where all the crude material can be brought together cheaper than any other place in the country, they have there begun (and it is now ready to be seen by any man who has interest enough to go 40 miles to look at it) a plant such as when completed there will be nothing on the Clyde to equal. It will within five years have twenty-five thousand people around its furnaces. It will be prepared to make anything from a nail to the finest vessel that floats upon the waters of the world; and they expect within ten years, with all the conditions as they now stand, with their ores taxed as they are by the present tariff—and half of the ores come from Cuba—to make vessels there as cheaply as they can be made upon the Clyde.

This is one of the outgrowths of the legislation of the last Congress, and the intelligent and patriotic administration of the Navy Department by a man who has grasped the situation and who understands the needs of the American people.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will it trouble the Senator if I interrupt him? I wish to assist in the discussion, merely.

Mr. GORMAN. Not at all.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is the Senator aware that my amendment proposes to precisely duplicate the successful force of the Navy?

Mr. GORMAN. No, Mr. President; I think before I get through, or at least I hope to do so, I shall convince even the Senator from Connecticut that it does no such thing. The one system is based upon the American idea. The proposition of my friend from Connecticut, who I know to be earnest in this matter, broad and liberal, and who has given it great attention, is based upon the English idea. permitting the Government alone to do the work, except so far as relates to the manufacture of steel, which is to be furnished to the Government.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator kindly allowed me to interrupt him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is exactly what the Navy Department is doing and wisely doing, and in accordance with the recommendations of all the boards. The Navy Department has a contract with the Bethlehem Steel Works for the rough parts, tempered and annealed, of the guns. It brings those guns to the Washington navy-yard, where they have been building up, almost unknown to Congress, an admirable finishing and assembling foundry. The Gun Foundry Board report, from which the Senator has quoted, with Simpson's name at the head of it, whose name he has given, recommends that identical course also for the Army. The amendment proposes to leave open to all the private enterprise in the country the contract to build rough parts of guns, to be finished and assembled for the Army at Watervliet, exactly as they are assembled and finished for the Navy at Washington.

Mr. GORMAN. The statement that the Senator has made as to the number of guns that have just been completed is exactly true. But that is not the point that I am making. You can not separate the manufacture of steel for the construction of your vessels and the manufacture of your guns. I say that the Government has made it a success only because it has pursued the policy of giving private enterprise and genius an opportunity to come in and furnish the material. The few guns that are being constructed at the Washington navy-yard are well enough in their way, but they form a very small part of what must be done. My main proposition is that it has been the unanimous opinion of every committee of Congress since the Fortieth Congress that while the Government must have its own establishments it must also permit private enterprise to come in and not only make the rough parts of the gun but to enable private enterprise to present to the Government a complete gun, tested by the Government's own methods exactly as you permit them to make the great ships of war.

It is true, Mr. President, that the last Congress made provision for an increase of the plant at the Washington navy-yard, and authorized the Secretary of the Navy to construct a certain number of steel guns from the forgings bought by contract. As the vessels of war were being constructed it was necessary to make an exception in favor of the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department, and it is also true that the Chief of Ordnance of the Navy is universally admitted to be far in advance of the Army corps. I am glad to say he has been broad enough to recognize that all the talent was not within his corps, but has been wise enough to take advantage of the best talent of the country in finishing and assembling his guns, and he has been giving great satisfaction to his superior officers. Yet if there were a private establishment in sharp and active competition with the Washington yard, no man doubts but that the naval officers in charge would produce better results at less cost than they will without such competition.

Sir, read the advertisements of the Secretary of the Navy for bids and the contracts that he has made for the construction of the ships. He not only permitted every ship-builder in the country to bid for the construction of the ships upon the plan furnished by the Navy Department, but he gave them the additional privilege of designing their own machinery, of making suggestions as to improvements in the vessels, and it was by that method and that method alone that you secured bids for the fast cruisers, yes, to be the fastest in the world. So it would be with the manufacture of ordnance if you give the master mechanics in private life a fair opportunity to compete with your Army officers.

I do not care to go back over the entire history of this matter, but there has not been a committee of either House of Congress since the Fortieth Congress that has not said that the Ordnance Department as now organized is affected with the dry-rot. The head has not and will not permit an inventor in this country to bring his invention to perfection, notwithstanding the fact that they have not for twenty-five years made a single improvement of any importance nor any ordnance officer urged or presented to Congress for adoption a plan which has not proved a failure. All they have done is to copy what the English and the French have done. The Ordnance Bureau as it is now organized, and as it would be under the amendment of my friend from Connecticut, would be the graveyard of American inventive genius and enterprise. They have destroyed every man in the country who has presented any gun, and notwithstanding the liberal amount recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, giving them in this bill nearly a million dollars as it stands, without the amendment of my friend from Connecticut, to experiment with, more money than they can properly spend in two years, to build and complete their machinery and plant at Watervliet, to get ready to compete with private enterprise, they are not satisfied with that. They want the exclusive control of this whole affair. They want $7,000,000 more—more than can be expended in four years.

Mr. President, when I speak of the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department I mean its organization; I mean the officers responsible and in charge of the bureau. I do not intend to underrate the officers of that corps. There are gentlemen in it who will compare favorably with any Army officers in the world. There are young men of education and bright promise, independence and manhood; but these, as a rule, are found in some second-class arsenals and have no opportunity for great work. Their superiors are practically in life positions. They have become attached to routine and to the traditions of the office in Washington. They are jealous of innovation and new ideas. No man in the Artillery Corps or in the Engineer Corps is permitted to make a suggestion as to the improvement of the ordnance. The fossils must be ordered to the rear, and any man in the Army who has developed special talent for the construction of these great engines of war must have an opportunity. This will come when the Ordnance Bureau is compelled to compete with the splendid mechanics and magnificent genius in civil life.

After the discussion of this question two years ago Congress had refused to appropriate a dollar unless new conditions should be imposed, unless the door was opened to Americans of genius and enterprise in private life to produce a gun. We refused in the last two Congresses to give ordnance officers a dollar; but in the mean time they have had an appropriation which has amounted to millions of dollars since the war, the proceeds of the sales of old stores and old ordnance supplies, which amount to about $75,000 a year. That they have used, and they have been using that fund since 1872, and from that fund they have produced one or two guns.

I have no unkind feeling toward the officers of this Department. On the contrary, I recognize that there are some exceedingly bright young men in it; but it is their organization, their system, their disposition to reject every suggestion that has been made by practical and enterprising men outside, against which I protest. One of them thought to call my attention to the fact that they had at last succeeded in doing something, after expending five or six million dollars from the money coming from the proceeds of sales, and he writes me a letter that at last they have made one 8-inch steel gun of greater power than was known in the world, and so far as I know, while it has only been fired forty-three or forty-seven times, it is the only product, it is the only result, it is practically all they have to show for the expenditure of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000.

Mr. President, what both committees of Congress in the past two Congresses have attempted to do, what they are attempting to do now, what is provided for in the bill that has already been formulated and is being considered by a body elsewhere, is liberal appropriations for the Ordnance Department, and the balance of it to be placed in the hands of a commission which will say to all Americans: "We have $5,000,000, or $6,000,000, or $20,000,000 to spend in the manufacture of 6, 8, 10, 12, and 16 inch guns. The Government wants them. As the Senator from Alabama has well said, there is not a single gun today on your coast that could defend you against any of these great ironclads, unless it be the dynamite gun. We want them. Our Government officers have not been able up to this time to make one. We will give you an opportunity. Put up your plant and present us a finished, complete gun, for which we will pay you liberally, and at the same time we will give the Army officers, or the ordnance branch, sufficient money to complete the plant at Watervliet, and buy the steel, for the Government can not make the steel; we will pit you one against the other. That is the only known method from which great results can be had. Now, go on and compete with the world, and let us have the best pattern that American genius can make."

But the Senator from Connecticut comes forward with a proposition which excludes all the outside world. He proposes to appropriate $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 (for the bill will amount to $7,000,000 if his amendment is adopted), and to place the entire manufacture, or the assembling and finishing of these guns, in the hands of the Army. That, I say, has been universally condemned by every committee of Congress which has considered this subject. It is unwise and impolitic. No man of private enterprise would engage in it, and it is no time for the Congress of the United States, with the restlessness there is, with the full knowledge that exists, to undertake it. But private enterprise has no consideration at the Army headquarters—I mean of the Ordnance Bureau of the Army, for with the General of the Army, whom we all trust will be spared to look over our affairs for a long, long time, they have had a cordial reception and the encouragement which comes from a great man and a patriot.

As an illustration of what has been done take the item in the bill referred to by my friend from Alabama, $400,000 for a pneumatic dynamite gun, the invention of an American, developed by one of the brightest men in the Army, not in the Ordnance Corps, but an artillery officer, Lieutenant Zalinski. There was an invention that the ordnance officers in Washington in effect said could not but be a failure. There was not one of them who ever dreamed that they could fire a dynamite shell a hundred yards successfully. No encouragement whatever was given to the development of that enterprise. Nothing but obstruction so far as the Government was concerned was offered by them. Without a dollar of aid, and by the expenditure of nearly a million dollars and with a courage and genius such as we have not seen in the last twenty years in that particular branch, this lieutenant and his friends have gone on until the world has been astounded by the result of the experiments made, testing it at their own expense, and driving the Department itself, the Secretary of War, and the General of the Army against what they believed to be possible to the conviction that it is to-day the most formidable weapon known to the world. I have it from the highest authority in talking over the communication which the Secretary of War sent to the Committee on Appropriations, and which will be found in the report accompanying this bill, that it was no longer an experiment, that it was perfect so far as it was possible to have an instrument of war of this sort perfect, and that the General of the Army and the best engineer officers in the United States Army—and I exclude in making this statement any members of the Ordnance Corps located in Washington, for they have set their faces against the genius and skill of Americans outside of their own corps, and they have nothing of it within it so far as we know by results—these officers have said to the Secretary of War that with ten or fifteen of these guns at the Narrows in New York Harbor it would not be possible for any ironclad that is afloat in the world to pass the Narrows with the dynamite guns there properly protected.

Mr. DOLPH. I did not understand the Senator. What officers are those?

Mr. GORMAN. The General of the Army is at the head of them.

Yet, Mr. President, when that proposition comes to this body embraced in the bill, the Ordnance Bureau, with all of its tact and genius (and it has the genius of promoting legislation to suit itself, but has an extraordinary talent for killing all legislation that does not originate with that corps), comes and throws obstructions in the way, makes insinuations as to its value, which necessarily have an effect upon legislators.

Sir, if I were Secretary of War and there was authority under the law for it, there is not a man in the corps who has been dallying about Washington for the past four years whom I would not send to the interior in order to bring some new blood here that would not interfere and obstruct these great measures which are recognized by all, except the members of the corps, as being of great value to this country.

Now, Mr. President, what have we provided for in this bill? More money than the War Department can possibly spend in two years, without the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. We give first the amount from the sale of old material, amounting to $75,000 a year, which has amounted to that much in the last few years. I will not trouble the Senate, however, to read the figures, but the amount is about $75,000 a year. They have that, they have $100,000 for experiments, and we have given them $600,000 to repair gun-carriages, to make gun-carriages, to complete the manufacture for which the Committee on Appropriations have been appropriating for the last eight years, and they are not yet completed. While I have not had time to gather together and to examine the various appropriation bills, I venture to say that the amount of money they have had is twice the amount that should have been required.

To complete guns under manufacture	$16,500
New seacoast guns	75,000
Steel mortar	17,000
Field-gun and mortar (experimental)	3,000
Projectiles (for testing guns and issues to service)	65,500
Powders	40,000
Seacoast and mortar carriages	80,000
Platforms	15,500
Siege and field carriages (experimental)	4,300
Expenses of proving ground and incident to test	15,000
Draughtsmen	4,000
Field-guns, carriages, etc., for issue	75,000
Twelve-inch mortars	90,000
Altering 8 and 15 inch carriages	75,000
Total	577,800

There is in the bill more money than they can expend in the next two years, and then the Senator from Connecticut desires to have placed in the hands of this bureau that has accomplished so little $6,350,000 more. I say that it would be the grossest extravagance. No appropriation of any kind should be made in that way. If it is to be made it should be on the conditions I have named, and I am ready so to vote for it. I advocated an appropriation for the purpose at the last session, and I am ready to do it again when it is put in proper form, that is to say to open it to the whole country, to give every enterprising firm here an opportunity to compete with our own officers and our own plant, but not otherwise.

Mr. President, to show that I am right in this matter, I propose to refer to a report made in the Fortieth Congress by the then Senator from Michigan, Mr. Howard. It was a report made by as intelligent a committee as was ever appointed by the Senate. In that report the committee say:

> The difficulty appears to have been twofold. First, the ordnance officers, knowing their positions secure to them for life, have not felt the incentive to exertion and improvement which stimulates men not in Government employ, and they have become attached to routine and to the traditions of their corps, jealous of innovation and new ideas, and slow to adopt improvements. An illustration of this is found in the fact that the late war was fought with muzzle-loading guns (with the exception of carbines for cavalry), although a variety of excellent breech-loaders were urged upon the attention of the Government constantly, and the honor was reserved for Prussia, with a weapon inferior to many American inventions, to demonstrate the immeasurable superiority of breech-loading guns. In the second place, these officers, educated to a specialty and proud of their positions, come to look upon themselves as possessing all the knowledge extant upon the subject of ordnance, and regard citizen inventors and mechanics who offer improvements in arms as ignorant and designing persons, and pretentious innovators, who have no claim to consideration. Instead of encouraging the inventive talent of the country, these officers seem to have constantly discouraged it, and many complaints of improper and oppressive treatment have been laid before the committee by persons who have sought to draw the attention of the proper authorities to what were supposed to be vital principles connected with their art.

Mr. President, the report from which I have been reading goes on further to say that there is another difficulty, and that is—

> That it is impossible to use navy ammunition in an army gun, or army ammunition in a navy gun. Co-operation between the Army and Navy while in active service is thus greatly restricted and in some cases has been entirely prevented. Offensive operations on the part of a joint expedition of the two might be brought to an end for the want of projectiles for the land forces, while the ships of the Navy possessed a surplus of the very articles required, which could not be used by the land forces.

And hence in all the appropriations hereafter made there should be a joint arrangement as to guns, and they should be of the same pattern in both services. That there would be economy in this is very evident. We should take the question into consideration on the only bill on which it ought to be considered, the fortifications bill, to make provision for that very defect which now exists. It is admitted on all sides that this is a serious defect which has cost the Government millions from the beginning, and will cost millions and millions if it is continued. A more equitable proposition has been suggested and agreed to unanimously by one commission to dispose of the millions that are to be appropriated, but the main point is summed up again in this report:

> That every encouragement should be given to inventors, and a full and fair trial accorded to all devices offered to the Government that promise a solution of the ordnance problem.

I say, with all the light we have had on this subject, and all the consideration we have given it, that this proposition is the one that the American people expect Congress to adopt for the protection of American interests.

I have said to my friend from Connecticut, and I repeat it now, that the Government entering upon these improvements has made it possible for more than one great steel manufactory in this country to increase its plant and begin the great work of making steel for guns. If it is seen that we will continue to make fair appropriations for this work, you have not only the one great steel manufactory, but you will have half a dozen others in this country within the next three or four years that will manufacture all the steel and all the guns for ships the Government may demand.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask whether the Senator would have us wait three years before we undertake to build a gun when we have not one now?

Mr. GORMAN. No, Mr. President, I would not wait one hour; but I would wait fifty years rather than say to the American people, "Your private enterprise and your genius shall be excluded by the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department." I am ready to make the appropriation to-day, or, rather, I am ready to make it upon the regular bill, when you can surround it by such conditions as will open the door to private enterprise; but I will not vote at any time in favor of the proposition of my friend from Connecticut that places the money in the hands of officers who have no respect for the rights of the people outside, who have failed always to recognize a valuable invention when it has been brought to their attention. You know, sir, as my friend from Connecticut must know, that there has been at least one great invention of an American civilian, who, after waiting here until his patience was exhausted and he was bankrupt almost, had complete success from foreign governments owing to the perversity and the peculiar organization of this Department, which is now to receive $7,000,000 more.

Mr. BECK. I wish to ask the Senator from Maryland a question. One of the objections I had in the Committee on Appropriations to such a proposition was that not only are the inventions of the American people excluded, but our own officers, in great part have, heretofore and I suppose now, patents for the inventions they expect to have used. I have always fought against officers of the United States getting out patents of their own. I want to know where the patents are now.

Mr. GORMAN. In the various reports from which I have been reading and in the report of every committee that has considered this subject, the fact has been stated and emphasized that there was not an invention that was adopted by the Ordnance Department except it was by one of their own officers or one which was taken by some one outside who had it tested abroad and then came back to our own country. You will find on your tables pamphlets from these various officers calling attention to their inventions and improvements.

In the letter that I referred to a moment ago it is said:

> Since 1872 we have witnessed the failure of the Sutcliff, Thompson, Hitchcock, Mann, Yates, and Haskell systems, and feel no small satisfaction in finally possessing a powerful gun which will stand the "racket," and which has a great reserve of strength to insure the morale of the soldiers who may have to use it.

I remember that there was an officer for whom I have had the highest regard from my childhood up. I mean the late General Logan, the great volunteer officer of our armies in the late war, and his feeling was so great, and his reports show it—and therefore I have a right to refer to it—upon this subject of the exclusion of American genius from the bureau, and the same conclusions were reached by General Rosecrans and by other volunteer and regular officers. Rosecrans was a graduate of West Point. There are strong denunciations of the action of the ordnance officers. When I began to investigate I supposed that the rivalry between regulars and volunteers, and between officers, outsiders, and the bureau officers, might have warped the judgment of Logan and Rosecrans, but I soon became convinced that they could have fairly gone further. When a bill came up in which was presented an appropriation to test an invention, these interests induced the most remarkable action on the part of Congress in preventing the test of what Congress had provided for from its inventors.

Then came the invention of which my friend from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] has knowledge. The inventor's efforts here were fruitless; his time was destroyed and lost; but he went abroad, and there his invention was accepted.

Mr. President, I am as anxious as my friend from Connecticut is to make this appropriation. I would not stop at $6,000,000. I would give them $20,000,000 to be expended in the next four or five years, but I would give it only upon condition that it was in the hands of a board who would not wait longer or spend millions in experimenting; who would contract with one, three, or five of the great steel works for the steel, and at the same time give to the great works at Bethlehem, Midvale, Chicago, Baltimore, and the one in San Francisco, and any others, an opportunity to furnish you a complete gun tested by the most severe tests that the Government chooses to apply.

When you do that then give to your own officers a sufficient amount for the Watervliet or any other arsenal, and say to them: "Here you are now in competition with the outside world; make the best gun you can; let us have the benefit now of all the skill that is in you. We have educated you at West Point, we have sent you abroad to examine everything that foreign governments have done; now let us see what you are made of; compete if you can with the men who have the genius and the courage on the outside." When it is done in that way then you will have results. As I said before, there is no party consideration and has not been. I am entitled to say that during the last four years this matter has been considered as a pure business proposition. That is the only way in which it ought to be treated, as a great public question without politics. If I do not mistake the temper of the American people, I do not believe that they are content to have their millions expended in any way other than that I have indicated—open competition, a fair field for every American mechanic.

Mr. HAWLEY. I confess, Mr. President, that this is an opposition that was hardly to have been expected to the amendment I have proposed, because the Senator from Maryland in general has been heartily in favor of this work. I did not know what his special and particular plans were, but I venture to say to the Senator now that he proposes the most monstrously expensive plan that I have ever heard in connection with the subject, and one that has been recommended by no single board and no single officer of the Army or Navy, and is not followed by his own Secretary of the Navy. I confess I am not only surprised but discouraged. It has now been thirteen years since one single dollar has been spent upon the coast defenses of this country, in the construction of them.

It has been two or three years since there has been money enough to cement a falling wall, to sustain a broken revetment, to paint an old carriage, to paint a gun, or to cut the grass upon the glacis; and the United States land forces have but one single modern gun, and that is on the proving-ground, not ready yet to be put in use. They have two or three others in the course of construction, but I am speaking of completed guns—I mean the larger gun necessary for siege and coast defense. They have twenty-five or thirty field breach-loading rifled guns for the artillery; and yet here comes the same old story over and over and over again: Wait; something is to be invented; somebody is to put up a new plant; there is something better to be done in the future.

Why, sir, I hope there are to be better houses and better clothing and better food as time goes on; but we must eat to-day, we must have clothing, we must have houses now. We must do the best thing that is to be done this day.

Mr. President, I want to talk directly to the Senator from Maryland. We must do the best thing that is to be done to-day. He has dwelt eloquently upon our reliance on private genius. There is no man who has a higher respect for the American mechanic and inventor than I have. I would take off my hat in the great machine-shops of Connecticut as I would almost in a church in deference to the marvelous skill and executive power of these men; but I say to the Senator that the great guns of Europe now and those that we propose to have are the result of the collection of the private genius of Europe and America, which has been devoted with an intensity not equaled anywhere else in the world on any subject to invention.

I say that the gun now adopted in Europe is the end of a generation of study. I suppose I should have voted, as I did in Congress twenty years ago, to build the best gun known then, though there was great doubt about that; but the world was in a transition state then. I affirm (and I ask all the mechanics and inventors and ordnance officers to stand with me, and I know they will justify me)—I affirm that we have now reached a stage in that development when we are no longer to be excused for waiting, for these great guns perhaps will never be obsolete. It can not be that a gun of 17 inches caliber, throwing a shot of 2,000 pounds, will ever be useless, for the limits of flotation in the building of armored ships have practically been reached. The vessels have 24 inches of forged steel to protect their vital parts, and yet an 1,800-pound shot or a smaller shot will smash them in. The limit of defense upon water is apparently reached. I do not expect to see within my time anything seriously better, anything greatly better, in resisting shot than the best forged and hardened steel.

Now the question is, having reached this culmination beyond question, all Europe having come step by step, one an inch and another an inch and another an inch, and converging a degree here and a degree there, the inventors and manufacturers and the governments having finally come together, whether we shall not adopt this, which is really just what the Senator calls for. It is done in a measure, too, by our own Rodman and our own Gardner and our own Hotchkiss and other men of that sort, and by Krupp, who built up his great works and who got his power largely through government contracts until now he makes guns for the world. It has been done, too, largely through the genius of Armstrong of England, and largely through the genius of Schneider of France, and the other great manufacturers and inventors.

Now let us take that. The Senator says that there is going to be a great establishment over here at Baltimore in three or four or five years. Certainly. Are we to wait three years without one gun before we ask for contracts? Why talk about leaving it open to the genius and power of our capitalists and steel-makers? That is what the amendment does.

We should think from what the Senator said that the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department has some particular pet gun of its own, the contract for which it wants to send to some particular pet firm. Does not the amendment provide that the statutes shall be followed? Does it not provide that advertisements shall be made for a certain period of time and sent to all the leading manufacturers? Does it not contemplate that they will offer to build these parts of guns, and that we shall take that which seems to be the best for the purposes, on the whole? That is what the amendment says.

I did hope, after we had lost the executive department of the Government, that there was no longer an excuse on the Democratic side for saying that men were thieves and liars and idiots at the other end of the avenue; and when the time had come, when nothing but perfect integrity reigned there from high to low, I thought then if we Republicans turned around and said, "Now, gentlemen, that you have got in, we will show you that we will trust you with any money necessary to put the country in a condition of defense," the offer would be accepted. I will trust Mr. Endicott, I will trust Mr. Whitney, each in his Department; whether I would otherwise or not I will trust him with the administration of his Department, very glad to vote him any money that is necessary. This is not put in the hands of Benét. There seems to be an impression that Benét knows nothing, and would not do anything if he did know it. Mr. Endicott controls every one of these contracts. Is he not as capable of awarding a contract as Mr. Whitney is? Precisely; and I wish to do for the Army just exactly what has been done for the Navy—just exactly the duplicate of it.

I repeat that my proposition is the one sanctioned by that very Gun-Foundry Board, from whose report the Senator has quoted. He eulogizes those men. That was an admirable board. Mr. Endicott made a fortifications board which has never been equaled in this country for qualification on this subject. I have the report of the Gun-Foundry Board here. I do not wait to read it, but I say that the Gun-Foundry Board examined the sources of supply for heavy guns in every country of Europe, and came to the conclusion that I seek to carry out in this amendment, and that the Navy is already carrying out.

The Navy Department has the right to advertise for the building of one hundred and eight steel guns. I do not know whether the proposals have been published or not, but they propose to leave it open to the prominent, able, and wealthy steel manufacturers to propose the terms on which they will construct the rough parts of those guns, and then they propose to bring them here to Washington to put in the fine finishing and the assembling of which I spoke yesterday. The finishing and sighting of the guns will all be done here. That is exactly what I wish to do at Watervliet for the Army, precisely the same thing.

The Senator would have us wait longer for experiments, I judge from what he says; and yet he says we want to wait no longer for experiments; but he proposes to do that which is a postponement. If I understand his proposition, it is that the private concerns shall be invited to make a perfected gun. I want to call his attention to this exact point. No large manufacturers in the United States will undertake upon any terms whatever that the Government would listen to, or the people sanction, to build a 12-inch or a 16-inch gun of American material and in their own shops purely for experiments. They will not do it, and I ask the gentleman, who, if I understood him aright, eloquently described the treatment given to Roach, to say whether if he owned a steel plant of two or three million dollars he would think it worth while to waste $1,000,000 of it in putting up a great costly plant, forging machines, etc., in order that he might finish one single gun which should then be tried by these same ordnance officers (for who else would try it?)

and then it might be objected to, or some improvement might have come on in the world in the mean time so that they would say we must have another gun. That is his proposition, as I understand, to ask the private manufacturers to build a completed gun. They will not do it.

This plan upon which I am acting is one devised by the men who studied the subject for a generation in the interest of economy and in the interest of proper checks and balances. Let the private manufacturers do this, which they would gladly agree to do on getting a contract for a pretty large quantity—several thousand tons; let them promise that they will deliver within a specified time certain sizes and kinds of steel, with tubes and jackets, etc.—parts of guns. This is their own suggestion; they not to have a dollar until it is delivered and tested and approved. They understand that kind of a contract. They do not care how strict you make the terms. Require whatever you please as to tenacity, ductility, density, and all those qualities, chemical or physical, of the steel. Anything you say in regard to size, anything you say in regard to annealing, tempering, putting them in, may be prescribed; and then they say, "If you want us to build 3,000, or 5,000, or 6,000 tons of this we will put in a plant of a million dollars and give you the best work to be had in the world." And so they will, without doubt. I have not the slightest doubt of it. They never reproduce European processes, because they will always lay down something better after having examined those produced abroad. When they have done that you are free of embarrassment. They can do that with about half or two-thirds of the plant that would be required if you demanded of them that they should produce a finished gun. They will not produce a finished gun as an experiment; they will on a contract. If you wish to command of these men a finished gun, then you must put in, not $5,000,000, but $10,000,000, and then leave the whole gun open to them.

You have given these men lessons during the last twenty-five years that they have not forgotten. You have given them years of agony for unpaid debts. You have sent man after man into bankruptcy. You have had them here by the dozen following Congress for a generation to get that which you owe them as honestly as you owe your landlady your board bill. You sent John Roach to the grave—a man who was an honor to the American mechanics, a splendid example of what this country can do for men. Do you suppose these men will seek any more such contracts? No, sir; not one solitary one of them will spend a million dollars to make you one gun.

This plan, I say, is devised by men who have studied this subject in the light of all these failures and experiments. They give to the Government a partial control; in the Government shops, the finishing and assembling shops, the finer and more skillful fitting and sighting are required to be done, and it is then comparatively easy to get contracts for the rough and unfinished parts, and we should do just the same by the Army as we have done by the Navy and as Great Britain has done. The Government has the machine tools of various kinds, some of which it has just withdrawn from the South Boston Iron Works, and it has at Watervliet, where there is a splendid water front, abundant opportunity in a neighborhood of skillful mechanics. If there be a plan that would admit jobs and delay and abuse in contracts, it is that suggested by the Senator.

He speaks of the dynamite gun as an established and final success. I do not know but that it is. I have heard Zalinski's lecture on the details, with the diagram and stereoscope, and I have read all I could get hold of on the dynamite gun from the beginning to the end of it. I think beyond doubt it is largely a success. I think it has come to stay as a part of the art of warfare; but I would as soon say that all you needed for a cavalryman was a saber with one spur, and all you needed for an army was a bayonet. It only fills one field in the system of defense, and it remains to be seen how much of that field it can fill.

Is the gentleman contented that, while you have not brought about the building of a single steel gun in many years, while you have not given out a single one of these contracts, yet here now you provide $40,000 apiece for ten dynamite guns—$400,000 in this bill? I do not object to it, even if it be an experiment. I do not think it will be money wasted; but I think it is as yet partially an experiment. He says the Ordnance Department opposed it and they have been about here to oppose that. I have been in communication with several of the leading men—skillful and accomplished men—of that bureau, and they have never said a word to me on the subject. I have consulted them, not because they asked me to do so, but because I know they have been for years familiar with the subject and with the necessity of action.

I think the grossest injustice is continually being inflicted on Army officers here. I know them. They do their duty without any reference to politics. I do not know how one man in the Ordnance Bureau votes, if he does vote, and I do not care. For this purpose I do not care who is Secretary of War. I wish to say, however, that both in the Army and Navy there is a body of young men from the time of leaving the Academy, say from twenty-one to thirty-five years of age, who are not surpassed, who are not equaled, in the staff corps of any nation for their excellent preliminary training, because there is not a military or naval school in Europe that equals our military and naval schools. They are not equaled for their preliminary training and for the zeal with which they have studied this subject from day to day, the curiosity and fidelity with which they read every foreign paper and magazine and Government publication on the subject. You may ask for a figure regarding any foreign navy or any foreign gun and you can get it by telephone in five minutes from the Bureau of Information in the Navy Department. You may go down there and have the present condition of all navies and all guns and all modern inventions laid before you. These men are aching that they may do something to justify the education that has been given to them and something that will give them reputation. We have few wars, thank God, but they desire to distinguish themselves in showing that we can build up an excellent system of coast defense with the best guns known in the world, and we can build the best ships and the best steam-engines, and if need be we can fight them the best.

I am proud of them on the whole. Of course there are exceptions. If we want a good army and a good navy, the first rule is to establish a high standard, and the next is to cut off relentlessly the head of a man who does not come up to it, and in the third place, to give them all honorable reward and encouragement and not perpetually treat them in our debates or in the newspapers on the idea that they are either ignorant or dishonest.

The Senator said that the amendment offered by me puts all this in the hands of the Ordnance Bureau. We do not put it in the hands of the Ordnance Bureau. We say that the Secretary of War shall invite these bids and shall accept them. Of course in advertising for proposals it is necessary that we should say what we would have built, and the War Department will say that we want just what the best peoples in the world have built up—forged steel guns.

At the same time while we would do that I would not overlook what there is of merit in the Senator's proposition. I do not seek to do what he would intimate—that is, to disregard and overlook private genius at all. I would be ready for any reasonable experiment, and the Ordnance Department has been for twenty years spending money, and I confess some of it against its own judgment. I know there have been cases in which tens and tens of thousands of dollars have been wasted in obedience to an order of Congress upon things that were of no mortal use whatever. I could read you quite a considerable catalogue of the guns which the Congress of the United States have from time to time directed should be tried.

The Senator says the Ordnance Department has had a considerable sum of money annually raised from the sales of old and obsolete guns and materials. So it has had, and whatever money has been so realized has been used largely for the renewal of the armament of the country, and most of the guns that have been made are still now counted among the resources of the Army. It has built field-pieces, it has worked upon carriages, it has done jobs of current work, repairs and manufacture, as from time to time it has obtained money in that way. The Senator might have had an itemized account of the manner in which that has been expended. I am sure the Ordnance Bureau has never kept books that could not be opened to the public, when we consider the severe criticism and scrutiny to which it has been subjected.

I will not detain the Senate longer. There may have been something more which I should be glad to answer, but I have referred to everything of importance said by the Senator from Maryland that I desired to reply to.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I was not satisfied with the answer of the Senator from Maryland to the question as to the patents upon guns adopted by the Fortifications Board and the Gun Foundry Board, that is to say, breech-loading forged steel rifles. Can the Senator from Connecticut inform me whether there are any American patents on those guns, and if so, whether any officer of the Army is interested in them?

Mr. HAWLEY. The proposition is to give the Government a certain large quantity of forgings, parts of great guns. The process of making them the Government has nothing to do with. I ought to say that these should be forged and not hammered, because the forge has superseded the hammer. The hammer affects only the surface of the steel, while the forge works it as bread is worked. But there is no patent on forms to my knowledge; there is no patent on processes that will be touched by this sort of contract, nor am I aware of any patent that any Government officer has on anything in the nature of a forged built-up steel gun. The only patent of which I have heard—I do not know that Zalinski is even an officer of the Army—is the patent on the dynamite gun which the Senator from Maryland praises so much.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am not particular in what form or on what bill we make this appropriation. I am not informed as to the point of order made by the Senator from Maryland, but that has been obviated at any rate by the action of the Senate, the decision having been in favor of the amendment being in order. I am not particular, I say, as to the bill on which this appropriation should be made; my own opinion is that without further delay we should begin this work.

If the position taken by the Senator frem Maryland be scrutinized, I think it will be found that he is not very far from the Senator from Connecticut in regard to what should be done. This amendment proposes to do for the Army what has been done for the Navy, nothing more and nothing less. The first section of the amendment makes an appropriation of $750,000 to provide a plant at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y. The second section of the amendment proposes:

For the purchase of rough-finished, oil-tempered, and annealed steel for high-power coast defense guns of 8, 10, and 12 inch caliber, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection at each stage of the manufacture, and including all the parts of each caliber, $5,000,000: Provided, That no money shall be expended except for steel accepted and delivered.

That is all that this amendment provides for so far as the manufacture of guns is concerned.

At a previous session of Congress an appropriation was made to convert the navy-yard at Washington into a place where the ingots of steel or the fragments, if I may use the expression, of steel should be collected for the purpose of being manufactured into guns. A proper appropriation was made for that purpose, and those guns are now being constructed in the navy-yard at Washington, 6, 8, and 10 inch guns. Whilst I do not pretend to be an expert in the manufacture of ordnance, I will venture the opinion that there are no better guns made anywhere upon the face of the earth than are being made to-day in the Washington navy-yard. I will venture the additional assertion that there is no better steel made anywhere in the world than is being made to-day in the United States. And, sir, I will go a step further, at the risk of differing with my distinguished friend from Maryland, and say that if this amendment be adopted and this appropriation be made for the Army, in less than twelve months' time guns will be manufactured under the direction and supervision of the proper officers of the Army which will equal any of their kind in the world.

I do not sympathize with the disposition to criticise the officers of the Army, especially of the Ordnance Department of the Army, because they decline to adopt the suggestion of every crank who chooses to go there with a device for an improvement in arms. If my friend, the Senator from Maryland, were a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, as I am, or of the Committee on Military Affairs, as the Senator from Connecticut is, he would soon come to the conclusion that the Ordnance Departments of the Army and of the Navy are subjected to a very trying ordeal. It has not been three days since a gentleman appeared before the Committee on Naval Affairs with a device which he thought was absolutely perfect for the removal of nets which are spread for the protection of a vessel against torpedoes; and yet when we subjected him to an examination as to the practical operation of it he had to admit that it had not been tested, and he flaunted in our faces the threat that unless the committee recommended the appropriation of the money he asked he would take the steamer on the 1st of August and go to Europe, where he would have his scheme adopted.

I mention that simply as an illustration of what the officers of the Army and Navy have to encounter almost daily; and when, forsooth, the suggestions of these gentlemen are not adopted and carried out by the officers of the Army and Navy they are denounced for rejecting the inventive products of the genius of the American people.

Now, sir, I do not believe that the Ordnance Department of the Army has rejected or will reject a single device which has merit in it and which is calculated to be an improvement on the present ordnance of the world. The Senator from Maryland asks me if it has ever adopted one. I am not now prepared to answer the question in detail, but the ordnance of the United States Government has been about equal, where it has had money to experiment with, to that of any nation in the world. The country is flooded with all kinds of devices and inventions for small-arms and for heavy ordnance, and my friend from Connecticut and my friend from Alabama remember that when we went to Sandy Hook there was a man there with a multicharge gun from which it was expected that great results would flow, and I believe upon a further experiment with it it proved to be a failure. So it has been perhaps with the others. Hence I think the Ordnance Department of the Army is not amenable to this charge of rejecting or refusing to encourage the inventive talent and genius of this country.

But what, Mr. President, does this amendment propose? As I stated, it proposes to spend $750,000 to put the Watervliet arsenal in condition to manufacture guns. It proposes then to appropriate $5,000,000 to be expended in the manufacture of parts of the steel to be used in guns. Now, how many guns does this country need? That is one of the important questions. How many guns have we that may be called available for any purpose whatever, considering the improvements in the armor of ships and the high-pressure guns of other nations?

I find in the report made by a select committee of this body on ordnance and war-ships the following:

PRESENT ARMAMENT OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.

In considering the best locations for manufacturing guns and armor, and the choice between Government and private work, it is well to see first what we have and what the future supply ought to be.

The Army has in forts and arsenals:

Smooth-bores:
20-inch caliber	2
15-inch caliber	308
10-inch caliber	998
8-inch caliber	210
		1,518

A total of 1,518 smooth-bore muzzle-loading guns—iron, my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] suggests.

Parrott rifles:
10-inch caliber, 300 pounders	38
8-inch caliber, 200 pounders	81
6.4-inch caliber, 100 pounders	173
		292
Converted from 10-inch smooth-bores to 8-inch rifles	160
Ditto under contract for conversion	50
		210

Mr. HAWLEY. Those are finished. There are now two hundred and ten converted.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad to hear it.

Smooth-bore mortars	45
		2,065

These are all muzzle-loaders. The nine classes require thirty-three kinds of ammunition. They are totally inadequate to the defense of our most important harbors. They may be utilized in the protection of harbors admitting only vessels of light armor and draught, and even there they should usually be supplemented by the modern breech-loading steel rifle, with its more rapid and efficient fire.

The number of serviceable naval great guns is:

Smooth-bores:
20-inch caliber	3
15-inch caliber	76
11-inch caliber	357
10-inch caliber, shell	12
10-inch caliber, shot	21
9-inch caliber	1,011
8-inch caliber, 6,500 pounds	345
32-pounders, 4,500 pounds	378
		2,234
Parrott muzzle-loading rifles:
150-pounders	28
100-pounders	297
60-pounders	75
30-pounders	375
20-pounders	245
Dahlgren muzzle-loading rifles, converted from 11-inch to 8-inch	50
		1,040
Parrott breech-loading rifles:
80-pounders	9
60-pounders	27
30-pounders	5
		41

That was the number of heavy guns that we had on hand at the time of this report, made in 1884. Of course it has been increased somewhat since.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator let me tell him the change? Thirty-four steel guns, all done but two or three, of moderate sizes. Either two or three are 10-inch. That has been the only addition.

Mr. BUTLER. I am much obliged to the Senator. I have not kept pace with the facts.

Mr. HAWLEY. Thirty-four steel guns added to that number makes the total.

Mr. BUTLER. That is sufficient for the purpose I have had in view:

The "Armament Board" of Army officers (see Senate Executive Document No. 5, Forty-eighth Congress, second session) in its report of December 5, 1884, being required to determine the character and number of guns required for fortifications and other works of defense, said:

"The board interpreted the act of Congress under which it was appointed to refer only to mortars and guns of high power for the defense of our harbors against foreign armor-clad vessels, and in their investigation have not taken into consideration the lighter guns required for the flank defense of permanent works."

And right there I will say in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from Maryland, that the best flank-defense gun that I have ever heard of, and I believe now the best confessedly on every hand, is the gun made by Mr. Hotchkiss, a distinguished man, who invented the celebrated shell bearing his name, and who, after our war, went to France and there manufactured ordnance for the French Government for seventeen years. I understand that the Hotchkiss gun has been adopted in a measure; so that the Ordnance Department does not exclude the invention of every outside person, for Mr. Hotchkiss is not in the Army.

Mr. HAWLEY. And a contract has been made for the manufacture of ninety Hotchkiss guns.

Mr. ALLISON. And we have thirty-six of them now.

Mr. BUTLER. So that the Ordnance Department have not rejected everybody's invention or anybody's manufacture who is not an Army officer or a graduate of West Point.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Gatling gun is on most ships.

Mr. BUTLER. There are the Gatling gun and the Nordenfelt gun and the Rodman gun.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Gatling, Hotchkiss, and Nordenfelt are American guns.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from South Carolina will allow me to suggest that what I said was that the Ordnance Department has never recognized or adopted any important improvement of an American. The only cases in which it has been done are where an American invention has been put into use abroad.

Mr. BUTLER. I take it for granted that one of the controlling reasons for that condition of things, if it is true—and I am not prepared to deny or admit it—has been due to the fact that Congress has been so parsimonious and illiberal in its appropriations for that purpose that it has not given the Ordnance Department the money needed to make the experiments. The Senator says they never recommended it. How can an ordnance officer of the Army recommend a thing which he knows nothing about, and how can he inform himself until he experiments with it? Congress declines to give him the money. Other governments give their officers the money; they experiment, and the thing turns out to be a success or otherwise.

The blame, if any there is, should be attached to Congress in refusing to vote money to the different departments of the Army and Navy for experimentation. When the matter is discussed, unless the problem is susceptible of absolutely accurate demonstration, they say "we can not spend the money for it; we must not spend any money unless the problem is worked out to the satisfaction of everybody in this country."

Mr. HAWLEY. Gatling went abroad because, while our Government liked his gun, and accepted the gun gladly, they wanted a few for the Western plains or a few for the Navy, and he could make no great sum of money here. He went abroad, and his guns are manufactured there, and the English would not have them unless they were manufactured on its own soil. That is the nature of that free-trade country; and so the Gatling guns are made there. Hotchkiss could not make any money over here. The Government liked the gun well enough, but the Government was not buying enough. It is an amazing thing here to buy ten guns in this bill. He went abroad, and the French and German and English Governments told him to build a great shop. Now, that we want arms, we have taken ninety of his; but what would ninety have been to Hotchkiss in thirty years?

Mr. BUTLER. Not only that, but there was great aptness in what was said by the Senator from Connecticut in regard to the pay by this Government of the people who take these contracts. Mr. Hotchkiss himself told me that when he got a contract with the French Government and held it he got his money at once, and did not have to dog around the doors of the legislative chambers for weeks and months, and perhaps years, and then be compelled to go into bankruptcy before he got his money.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the Senator will remember that Mr. Hotchkiss told us that they always advanced him something on his gun contracts.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir, and that is one of the reasons why the inventive talent of this country has had to go abroad and seek there a market for its products.

But, sir, proceeding with its recommendation the armament board says:

> The board first directed its attention to the depth of water in the channels leading to all of our seaports, and then ascertained the number of and thickness of armor of the known ironclads of the world which could enter their harbors.
> The powers of the guns necessary to penetrate these armors were then calculated and the numbers of guns considered essential for a proper defense of the harbors was decided upon. In that determination the board was guided by a list of guns and mortars which had been prepared by the Board of Engineers for fortifications after careful study of the subject.
> The decision in regard to the calibers, length of bore, and weights of guns and projectiles was made from an examination of the most powerful and approved types of modern guns known in this country and in Europe. The weights of these guns and of their steel-armor-piercing projectiles being definitely known, they are not given between limits.
> The following tables give, as far as it can be ascertained, the information which the board is called upon to furnish:

So it appears from this report that this Government ought to have, for anything like a sufficient armament for coast defense, twelve hundred and nineteen guns of that character. How far will $5,000,000 go in that direction? It will be a mere bagatelle, and I do not hesitate to say that if some of the money should be wasted in arriving at the best weapon that can be made in the world I should be perfectly content; not that I desire to see any money thrown away, but no great improvement by any great government can be made in war-ships or in war material of any kind unless some money is thrown away, because we can not reduce the calculation to an absolute certainty.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland says we ought to encourage private contractors, private enterprise; that the Government ought not to enter upon the manufacture of its own guns. I agree with him entirely in that. The Senator from Connecticut, I understand, agrees with that proposition, and there is nothing in this amendment which forbids it.

And, sir, at the risk of being a little tiresome, I shall ask the Secretary to read the remainder of the report made by the select committee of the Senate to which I have referred on that subject.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CONCLUSIONS.

Our conclusions are:

1. The United States is metallurgically independent for all purposes of war fare.

2. The manufacture of iron and steel for peaceful purposes has kept pace with the foremost science and skill of the world. For steel-making the casting capacity is ample, but the heavy forging and finishing of guns and armor will require new and costly plants.

3. The machinery and machine tools of the navy-yards are sufficient for the building of engines, but much of it is obsolete and no longer economical; the means of building iron or steel ships are lacking; one yard has a good plant of limited capacity for finishing steel guns and has done some good work.

4. As a partial check upon private builders and as a resource in case of necessity, some ships should be built in navy-yards, the parts to be furnished by private foundries. Ships in general should be built by private contract, and private yards are capable of doing the work. The uncertain nature of repairs is such that some Government yards should be kept ready to make them.

5. Armor plate and engines should be obtained wholly from private manufacturers.

6. The costly experiments of twenty-five years have reached a stage which justifies certain conclusions. Guns should be made of open-hearth steel, forged, breech-loading, chambered, of calibers ranging from 5 to 16 inches, of lengths ranging from 30 to 35 calibers. Armor and projectiles should be made of forged steel. The hydraulic forging press produces better results than the steam-hammer, costs much less, and should be used for Government work. Ships should be constructed of steel, but certain minor classes may be composite of steel and wood.

7. The manufacture of guns suitable for ships and coast defense should be divided between private foundries and Government shops; the former providing the forged and tempered parts and the latter finishing those parts and assembling them.

8. The Government should establish two factories for machine-finishing and assembling guns. The weight of opinion among Army and Navy experts and prominent manufacturers of heavy work in steel decidedly indicates the Washington navy-yard and the Watervliet arsenal as the best sites for such factories. When the determination to contract for heavy guns shall have been reached, the localities for finishing them can easily be determined.

9. All needed private capital is ready for cheerful co-operation with the Government in whatever it may require.

10. Proposals for armor and guns should require such quantities and extend over such a series of years as to justify private persons in securing the best plant. Payments should be made only for completed work, and only the guarantied bids of persons having capital and experience should be considered.

Respectfully submitted.

J. R. HAWLEY, Chairman.
N. W. ALDRICH.
W. J. SEWELL.
J. T. MORGAN.
M. C. BUTLER.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, those are the conclusions of the select committee appointed by the Senate for the purpose of inquiring into the subject; and if at any time or anywhere there has been a suggestion that this work should be done entirely by the Government, I am ignorant of it. And there is nothing in this amendment, if this appropriation should be adopted, that would prevent Congress making an appropriation and putting that money in the hands of a commission to use just exactly as the Senator from Maryland has suggested. But I think he will recognize the wisdom and propriety of the Government being independent of all private enterprises in such matters. That was the policy adopted in regard to the Navy. It was thought that one or two of the navy-yards of the Government should be put in condition to build a ship out and out, and one is now being constructed in the navy-yard at Norfolk, and perhaps one at another navy-yard.

Other ships are being built by contract. So it would be with the guns. But it does seem to me that a government like this should at least have one place where it can collect the various parts of a gun and put them together independent of any other establishment in this country.

My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] very properly suggests that the expenditure of this money will extend perhaps over four or five years, so that there is no very great danger to result in that aspect of the case. But, Mr. President, it seems to me, as I said awhile ago, that it is of the last consequence that the Government should have one or perhaps two establishments of its own where it can make itself independent of private establishments.

Now, in regard to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Maryland about the patents of Army and Navy officers being used and that the patents of nobody else are used, I think that must be imaginary. If the guns that are being fabricated now at the navy-yards are being made in pursuance of any patent of any Navy or Army officer, I am not aware of it. Perhaps the Senator from Connecticut can tell me how that is.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am assured by Army gentlemen that not a single officer of the Ordnance Bureau has a patent of any description for anything that is used.

Mr. BUTLER. That is my information. So I think that objection is more imaginary than real, and that the Government is not likely to suffer on that account.

In regard to the patents for the manufacture of steel, I do not understand that this amendment requires the War Department to accept any particular patent. It requires the steel to be subjected to a certain test and that it shall come up to that test, and if it does it is accepted, and not otherwise. But, as is suggested in the conclusions of this report, the liquid-compressed steel is superior to that which is produced by being hammered, and the 100-ton hammers are now going out of vogue. So we are not likely to have any evil consequences from those causes.

Now, one other observation, Mr. President. We have heard much of late years about seacoast defenses and about the propriety of appropriating immense sums of money for permanent fortifications. I undertake to say, and I believe I am entirely within bounds when I do say it, because the Senator from Connecticut made substantially the same statement, that there is not one single gun in possession of the United States Government to-day to be put upon the fortifications for any of our harbors—not one.

Mr. HAWLEY. Not one of the modern style.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course I mean that. I say there is not one single gun of modern style to mount upon a fortification if we had every river and harbor in this country protected by permanent fortifications, so it looks to me as if we are proceeding as a man would who commenced building his house by beginning at the top.

Mr. HAWLEY. The most powerful old cast-iron gun we have is a 20-inch gun, and it compares with the powerful rifle that heads the list in Great Britain by the figures of 18 to 57 in energy.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely. To mount those guns upon permanent fortifications and to compel men to stand behind them against the high-power guns of Great Britain and other foreign governments would be little short of murder.

We ought to make a beginning if we are going to have guns that are at all equal to those of other governments—modern guns, I mean. If we are going to have them at all we ought to begin at once to prepare for their manufacture. Then after having made some progress we could begin to put up some fortifications for the harbors of the United States, and let the two go hand in hand. But it would be perfectly useless for us, it seems to me, to build permanent fortifications anywhere in this country without guns to mount on them. So there is every reason why the Government should enter at once, without another day's delay, on the manufacture of the best guns that can be made anywhere in the world; and I believe that if we give the War Department of this Government the money needed they will build as cheap and as complete and as effective guns as can be made anywhere in the world.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr President——

Mr. BECK. Allow me one word, as I was referred to.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well.

Mr. BECK. This very important question ought not to be attached as an amendment to an appropriation bill in which we have to provide for the Army of the United States for the year beginning on Sunday next; but here we are confronted now with a proposition that may hang up the bill between the two Houses for a month, when we have two committees specially charged with the business of attending to guns for the Army and guns for the Navy, and they have had seven months in which to present a bill, and without doing it now they say that urgency is demanded and that there ought not to be a day lost. They have lost the seven months of the session now passed; they have had the matter under consideration and have not yet prepared a bill for the two Houses to act upon on its merits; and yet they now attach this as an amendment to the Army appropriation bill, and the other House is to be coerced into the passage of something on this question or the Army is to go unprovided for.

That is the attitude in which the two committees charged with these matters seek to place the Congress of the United States. If the measure had any merit in the seven months that have passed, when we were adjourning from Thursday to Monday for weeks and months and doing nothing, they could have afforded to bring the subject up and discuss it. Whether the Senator from Maryland or the Senator from Connecticut be right, and whether we are to go into the hands of patentees in the War Department or anywhere else, or whether we are going to exclude fair propositions or favor certain gentlemen, could all have been discussed and the House of Representatives could have met the questions fairly without the pressure of this "stand and deliver" policy or prevent the Army of the United States from being sustained.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon. I have said all I care to say.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Kentucky speaks of the action of the Committee on Military Affairs in pressing this question, and he says the Senate is seeking to coerce the other House, and says it as if in bad humor. The discussion has been very remarkable for its mildness. I think there is no disposition to coerce the other House.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from South Carolina mistakes a piece of earnestness for bad humor. I never stir up anybody. There is no bad humor in me. No one will spend more money than I for guns; but what I object to is what has been going on for years, spending millions on the navy, pretending to get a navy and getting no navy, pretending to get guns and getting no guns. We have given money and we will give money without stint whenever we see that we are going to have the money fairly and properly applied; but before that is done the committees having charge of these matters ought to bring them up and have them discussed in the Congress of the United States, and give assurance that the money will be properly expended without favoritism and without rewarding persons interested in patents. That is all we ask.

Congress has been charged time and again with failing to act, but it has been because Congress had no faith in the expenditure which they were asked to make. When Professor Baird was alive and he asked to build the great museum he was told to take all the money he wanted, which he did, and he built it for half what other people would have done. When the War, State, and Navy Department building was under construction and Colonel Casey was put in charge of it, after the State Department was put up he was told to take all the money he wanted. When General Meigs was in charge of the Pension Office we said: "We will give you all the money you want." We knew the money would be honestly expended. But when we are asked to buy guns for the Navy or the Army we want to know whether the money is to go into the hands of favored contractors. When ships were sold for old scrap Congress did hold back, because they wanted to be assured that they would get what they were contracting for. Congress ought to be dealt with fairly.

All I ask now is to be assured—for I have no sort of means of knowing—whether this is the best plan. I am not on the Naval Committee or the Military Committee. I am on the Appropriations Committee, and when this is flung in to us, as it was yesterday morning, as an amendment to an appropriation bill, without having had a chance to look at it, without having had a chance to call on the heads of Departments about it, we are told we must attach it to an appropriation bill when we had never even seen it until yesterday morning, and then it came from the Committee on Military Affairs, fresh from a hearing the previous afternoon, who put it in the hands of a committee that had never seen it before, and the fact is, we could not have had time to read it or perfect it. I say this is not the proper bill to place it upon.

Mr. HAWLEY. Would it make it any better to place it on the fortification bill, which has not come yet and nobody knows when it will come?

Mr. BECK. I suppose that it should come in as an independent measure if it has merit, and not be sought to be forced through whether we like it or not, or have the Army bill fail.

Mr. HAWLEY. It went through the Senate unanimously as an independent measure at the last Congress.

Mr. REAGAN. I will say to my friend, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], that the action of the Senate has placed this amendment fairly before it. I will suggest, in the first place, that the Committee on Coast Defenses, of which I am a member, have given a good deal of consideration to the defenseless condition of the country and to the necessity of preparing for proper defense, and have reported a bill to the Senate recommending the appropriation of very considerable sums of money for the purpose of providing proper guns and proper fortifications. The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] is in the line of the recommendation of the Committee on Coast Defenses, only that it appropriates much less money, and therefore it is more liable to be acceptable to the Senate and to the other branch of Congress and to secure action and enable us to commence doing something on the subject. But as to the Senate being unprepared for the subject, as suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, I would observe that the Senate committees have been considering this subject for years. The subject has occupied the attention of the War Department, of the Navy Department, and of Congress for a number of years, and the necessity for action has been pressed upon Congress.

The first section of this amendment provides for the appropriation of $750,000 to secure "the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for an Army gun factory for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance, to be erected at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., in accordance with the recommendations of the Gun Foundry Board of February 16, 1884."

That we need such an establishment I think there is hardly any controversy by any one.

The second section of the amendment provides:

For the purchase of rough-finished, oil-tempered, and annealed steel for high-power coast-defense guns of 8, 10, and 12 inch caliber, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection at each stage of the manufacture, and including all the parts of each caliber, $5,000,000.

It is objected by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] that this work ought to be let out to competition. This particular item, which calls for the principal part of the money asked for, is for the purchase of steel, which is to be furnished upon competitive bids in response to a notice from the Government, and is open to the competition of all persons who think they have the capacity to manufacture such steel as is required.

If I was better qualified to discuss this subject than I am I would not in the present stage of business undertake to detain the Senate by a prolonged discussion. I simply desire now to call attention to a feature of this question not embraced in the discussion of Senators who have given more attention to the quality and character of the arms to be furnished.

The United States is the leading power in the Western Hemisphere. With its sixty-five millions of people, with a population larger than that of any country in Europe save Russia, with a commerce larger than that of any other country in the world save Great Britain, it has to compete with the enterprising, aggressive populations of Western Europe and the teeming millions of Asia, situated on the half-way ground between them, so that we must recognize the necessity and the obligations which rest upon a first-class power. We can not ignore the fact that the United States now has, by its population, by its position in the earth, reached a point that makes it necessary to be a first-class power, unless we propose to abdicate the duty of the American Government and the rights of American citizens.

In this condition of things what next comes to our view? That we have a seacoast of 10,000 miles and a northern border of three or four thousand miles more upon a country more likely to have antagonisms with us than any other. Our frontiers and our seacoast are to-day, in view of the armaments of the other nations of the earth, powerless and defenseless. Is this condition of things to be tolerated by the American Senate? In view of such a condition of things are we to wait until the mind of every Senator shall be satisfied with every detail of a measure necessary to place the country in a proper condition of defense?

I do not profess familiarity enough with the subject to know that this is the best measure that could be adopted, but it is a measure in the right direction, and I do not think we can commence too soon to manufacture first-class guns, nor do I think we can commence too soon to make proper preparation for the defense of our seacoast cities and for the protection of our northern frontier.

The best negotiators get along a little better when they have good guns and good ships at their back. I care not what the population, what the wealth of a nation may be, if it is unprepared to defend its rights and defend its people it is subject to encroachments at the hands of those nations with greater foresight who seek to impose unjust terms. No Senator can doubt to-day that if the United States were involved in war with any first-class power of the earth, especially one having a first-class navy, while in the end we should sustain ourselves, in the beginning hundreds of millions of dollars must be sacrificed, with the loss of life, the wreck of fortunes, and the misery which always follows such calamities; and what would be five or ten or one hundred million dollars expended for the public defense rather than such a calamity as this should befall the American people to injure their interests and to humiliate their pride?

I shall vote, sir, with pleasure for the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, because it seems to me that it begins in a right way. Whether it is the best way or not, I am not expert enough to say; but it begins in a right way, and no better way seems to have been suggested yet. If any Senator has a better way I will accept that; but until a better is proposed I shall vote for this amendment. I believe that it is our duty to prepare better for the defense of the rights and honor of the American Government and people.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I fully concur in the remarks of the Senator from Texas and other Senators who have advocated this appropriation. I am one of those who do not believe that it has been economy heretofore to wait for other nations to make inventions and to build guns, and to wait until they have perfected them.

What is the object of guns and of an army and a navy? We do not expect war, but we want to avoid war. If we remain entirely defenseless we must be subjected to humiliation continually or have war. That is the experience of all nations. We are without any guns at all; it takes six years to prepare them, and think of what we must submit to in case of emergency! Consequently we are in no condition to treat with any foreign power; we have got to put up with its decision. The islands of the Pacific are being occupied by other nations, taken up one after another. We can not even protest. The Isthmus is going into foreign hands. We can hardly protest. All along our northern border our opposite neighbor is doing whatever she pleases, and we can make no effectual protest; but everything is excused here on the ground that we must submit; that we are in no position to do otherwise; it is the best thing we can do in our defenseless condition.

Not only that, but failing to build guns ourselves and make experiments ourselves, we are sacrificing the experience we should gain by building guns. We must make some mistakes. Other nations have made mistakes. We can afford the expense if we would have the experience; but in case of an emergency we are here without any experience whatever, with no shop fit to build guns in, and no cannon; we must wait until our seaboard is destroyed or submit to the most humiliating terms.

We are supporting an army and a navy. We have the best naval and the best military academies in the world, and I believe we are educating the finest class of young men. If we will give them an opportunity, if we will go on and make the necessary preparation and give them something to act with, they will defend the country. And it is a reflection upon these officers, it is a reflection upon the whole system, that we dare not trust anybody to build the necessary guns, to construct the necessary fortifications, to build the necessary navy, and we must wait. I have heard a great deal about the money we have saved by waiting. We have lost immensely in the skill, in the experience, in the establishment necessary to keep our country in a constant state of preparation.

Until this world forgets the art of war, until we have a guaranty of universal peace, until arms are entirely abandoned, we must remain in a state of readiness for war in order to have any prospect of peace. If we are in readiness we may be the most peaceful nation on earth. If we have our establishments so that we can build a first-class gun, if we have some first-class ships, if we properly fortify our coasts, nobody will interfere with us, and we can then talk of the Monroe doctrine, and we shall not be told that we are too weak to defend our rights.

It is false economy, because one of two things is inevitable, that we must submit to a third-class power, so far as all negotiations are concerned, and submit to the most humiliating terms whenever we deal with any nation, or we must be in a state of preparation, because we dare not make the sacrifice that war would bring, with our vast cities on the seacoast and on the lakes entirely unprotected. The destruction of life and property would be so great that no statesman would dare vindicate the rights of our country, no President dare do it if there was a prospect of war with any nation. I say, if we would maintain our position on the continent, if we would be respected as a nation, we must go forward and make some mistakes, if necessary, but we must go on and be prepared to build guns and to build ships, and we must build some, for we shall never learn how to build unless we commence building.

It is humiliating to talk about waiting for other nations to make the experiments, and then sending spies there to find out what they have done, so that we can follow it, when we have more inventive genius than any nation on earth in every department, and we can be trusted to excel in every mechanical art if we will go ahead. Our people are able and competent, our country is unbounded in resources, and we need not wait for other peoples to invent arms and means of fortification.

We should go on with experiments and we can lead; but if we wait until the emergency comes, suffer the humiliations and the destruction and indignities to our flag from every power in the world, we shall be not only exercising bad economy but bad patriotism, bad because we can not make the people of the world respect our flag unless it has power behind it. We can not make our own people love it unless we make the world respect it; and the way to make a united people is to make them proud of the power and greatness of the nation, proud of being American citizens, proud of the flag wherever it floats; and in order to do that we must be prepared to defend that flag.

Then let us go forward. This is a small appropriation. It may not have been perfectly considered, and drawn in the best way. I do not know whether it has been or not, but it comes well recommended; it is clearly defined; it is intelligently set forth by the gentleman who presents it, and I do not think we shall have a better opportunity at this session to get a vote of the Senate in favor of preparing for war in time of peace, and taking a step towards placing this country in a position that every third-rate power of the whole world will not feel at liberty to insult our flag and humiliate American citizens.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I rose when the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] obtained the floor and made his clear and comprehensive and I may say patriotic address on this question, not to recite any of the arguments which have been adduced during the last half dozen years in favor of the construction by the United States of modern guns, but to call the attention of the Senate to the remarkable concurrence of opinion on the part of all persons, members of Congress, members of the Army and Navy, and private citizens who have investigated this subject.

The first formal investigation was made by the gun foundry board, which was organized in pursuance of the act of March 3, 1883, five years ago, and upon that board were Rear-Admiral E. Simpson, Capt. E. O. Matthews, and Lieut. W. H. Jaques, of the Navy, and Col. Thomas G. Baylor, Lieut. Col. Henry L. Abbott, and Maj. Samuel S. Elder, of the Army. That board visited Europe; they visited all the works in America, and they made a report on the 20th of February, 1884.

On the 12th of March, 1885, President Cleveland appointed, under the act of March 3, 1885, what is known as the fortifications board. I call the attention of Senators to the distinguished character of the members of that board. The Secretary of War, Hon. William C. Endicott, was president; Brig. Gen. Stephen V. Benét, Brig. Gen. John Newton, Lieut. Col. Henry L. Abbot, and Capt. Charles S. Smith, of the Army, and Commander W. T. Sampson and Commander Caspar F. Goodrich, two of the ablest officers of the Navy, and two eminent civilians, Mr. Joseph Morgan, jr., of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Erastus Corning, of New York, constituted that board, and their report was in due time made and has been printed by the order of Congress.

In addition to investigations made by these boards, two committees of Congress were appointed to make investigation and report. I hold in my hand the report of the House committee, Report No. 1450, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, the members of which commission, for it was a joint commission of the two Houses in the first instance, were Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, Mr. Hewitt, of New York, Mr. BURNES, of Missouri, Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, Mr. HISCOCK, of New York, Mr. REED, of Maine, and Mr. PHELPS, of New Jersey. They made a report in which they discussed the whole subject. Then we have the report of the Senate Committee on Ordnance and War Ships, which was the complement of the commission appointed by the Senate and the House. Their report, which was made as long ago as February, 1886, is signed by Senator HAWLEY, Senator ALDRICH, Senator Sewell, Senator MORGAN, and Senator BUTLER. These reports have been also supplemented and indorsed by reports by the Senate Committee on Ordnance and War Ships, the present committee, at the head of which is the Senator from Oregon, Mr. DOLPH.

The report of the Senate Committee on Ordnance and War Ships is remarkable for being the result of a most thorough and exhaustive examination of this subject. The members of the committee, I doubt not, are too modest to do themselves justice with reference to this report, but I take occasion to pronounce it as having been founded upon as complete and thorough and exhaustive an examination of this subject as ever was made of any subject by any committee or any commission whatever.

I give the membership of the committees and commissions to which I have referred:

Senate Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships, 1886.—J. R. Hawley, chairman; N. W. Aldrich, W. J. Sewell, J. T. Morgan, M. C. Butler. (See report of the Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships, Senate Report No. 90, Forty-ninth Congress, first session).

Board on Fortifications or other Defenses (appointed by the President of the United States under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1885).—Hon. William C. Endicott, Secretary of War, president of the board; Brig. Gen. Stephen V. Benét, Chief of Ordnance; Brig. Gen. John Newton, Chief of Engineers; Lieut. Col. Henry L. Abbot, Corps of Engineers; Capt. Charles S. Smith, Ordnance Department; Commander W. T. Sampson, United States Navy; Commander Caspar F. Goodrich, United States Navy; Mr. Joseph Morgan, jr., of Pennsylvania; Mr. Erastus Corning, of New York. (See report of the board printed in House Executive Document No. 49, Forty-ninth Congress, first session).

Commission on Ordnance and War Ships (appointed under resolution of the House of Representatives, approved July 6, 1884, and continued under provision of the act of March 3, 1885, volume 23, Statutes at Large, page 470).—Hon. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania; Hon. Abram S. Hewitt, of New York; Hon. James N. Burnes, of Missouri; Hon. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia; Hon. Frank Hiscock, of New York; Hon. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine; Hon. William Walter Phelps, of New Jersey. (See report of the Commission on Ordnance and Gunnery, House Report No. 1450, Forty-ninth Congress, first session).

Senate Committee on Coast Defenses (first session, Fiftieth Congress).—Joseph N. Dolph, of Oregon; James Donald Cameron, of Pennsylvania; Joseph R. Hawley, of Connecticut; Frank Hiscock, of New York; John R. McPherson, of New Jersey; Wade Hampton, of South Carolina; John H. Reagan, of Texas. (See Senate Report No. 603, Fiftieth Congress, first session).

Mr. President, with all this investigation we have the remarkable fact that all of these committees and commissions and all the members of these commissions and committees reached the one conclusion, which is expressed in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, and which has been expressed in the report which the Senator from South Carolina to-day has incorporated in his remarks, and that conclusion is, that if the United States is to have any modern guns either for its war ships or for its fortifications, it should procure them in this way, by making contracts with American manufacturers to produce the steel and get it into a condition where it can be taken and fabricated into the gun. I say that with this common consensus, with this universal agreement, with nobody dissenting, it is about time that something should be done.

In 1883 there appeared by the report of the Navy Department the number of guns then possessed by the Navy. The Senator from South Carolina has read a statement showing the number and condition of the guns of the Army. I will read a statement as to the number of guns of the Navy. They were large in number, but worthless for all practical purposes:

The guns of the Navy are 2,233 smooth-bore muzzle-loading cannon of various calibers; 77 Parrott muzzle-loading 40-pound rifles; 267 similar 80-pound rifles; 51 muzzle-loading 180-pound converted rifles; 26 breech-loading 40-pound converted rifles; and 10 breech-loading 80-pound converted rifles.

The 87 converted rifles have fair power, and may be considered useful for the present. The Parrott rifles were made during and immediately after the rebellion; they might in an emergency serve a subordinate purpose as part of our armament, but are in no real sense suited to the needs of the present day. The smooth-bore guns are incapable of contending with rifled guns throwing one-half their weight of shot.

With not one modern high-powered cannon in the Navy, and with only 87 guns worth retaining, the importance of action for the procurement of naval ordnance seems apparent if the Navy is to longer survive.

Since that time there have been built for the Navy, as has been stated by the Senator from Connecticut, about thirty guns for the ships now under construction, and authority exists to construct about one hundred and eight more modern guns for the Navy; but as yet, as has been so well stated, and I repeat it, the Army of the United States has not one modern gun except an experimental gun which it has managed to construct. Yet we stand here discussing the question whether we shall authorize the Army to build guns upon an appropriation bill or shall wait to pass a special bill and go over all this ground again.

Mr. President, I hope that unanimously, without any distinction of party, the Senate will agree to the appropriation of $5,000,000 which is named in the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

I desire before closing to say that I do not understand that this amendment is obnoxious to the criticisms made by the Senator from Maryland. I do not understand that the amendment excludes the War Department from making contracts with private gun establishments to fabricate guns if any such establishments come forward and offer to build them. The amendment proposes that the Watervliet arsenal shall be put in a condition to build guns. I do not understand that the Senator from Maryland objects to that. The amendment provides for procuring $5,000,000 of gun-metal for the Army. However, it does not provide that that $5,000,000 of gun-metal shall be worked up and used in the Government shops, but it is entirely open to the War Department, as I understand it, when that metal is ready, to make contracts with private manufacturers to construct guns. As I understand, there are to-day existing contracts both with the Cold Spring Foundry and the South Boston Iron Works for the construction of guns for the Navy.

The whole question raised by the Senator from Maryland, as I understand it, is outside the present measure, which simply says that we will fit up the Watervliet arsenal, and that we will provide $5,000,000 of gun-metal for the Army of the United States for Army guns, as we have already provided nearly $5,000,000 of gun-metal for the Navy.

I hope, Mr. President, that there will be no objection to making an arrangement by which the other powers of the world may understand that after five years of investigation, all leading to the same result, the United States of America propose to build guns that are fit to be put in the fortifications of the United States.

Mr. DOLPH obtained the floor.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the bill (S. 2929) to authorize the Paris, Choctaw and Little Rock Railway Company to construct and operate a railway, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was presented to the President on June 14, 1888, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, it had become a law without his approval.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate sundry messages from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate further insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. COCKRELL.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives insisting upon its disagreement to the sixteenth amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6833) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year 1889, and asking a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ALLISON. In the absence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who has charge of the bill, I move that the Senate still further insist on the sixteenth amendment, and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appoints as the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. ALLISON. As the disagreement is on an amendment presented to the Senate by the Committee on Foreign Relations, I ask that I may be excused from service upon the conference committee, and I beg to suggest that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] be substituted in my place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will be excused, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] will be appointed in his place.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust for the explanation of the matter fully to the committee on the part of the House that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] will be added as a member of the conference committee, either in place of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], or, if that is not deemed advisable, that the conference committee on the part of the Senate be increased to four. I think it is better that that should be done, because the Senator from Alabama is more familiar with the whole subject than I am.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair believes that there is no precedent for the appointment of four managers of a conference on the part of the Senate. If it is desired by the Senate, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] may be substituted for the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see the Senator from Kentucky present, but I have no doubt he would at once assent to it if he were present. I move that the Senator from Alabama be substituted for the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, then, will announce as the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10233) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. PLUMB, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. PLUMB, Mr. FARWELL, and Mr. CALL.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives further insisting on its disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8989) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and asking a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. PLUMB, it was

Resolved, That the Senate further insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. PLUMB, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. COCKRELL.

BRIDGE AT WABASHA, MINN.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the vote by which the bill (H. R. 7749) to authorize the building of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Wabasha, Minn., was indefinitely postponed be considered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed will be reconsidered, if there be no objection, and the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

LOAN OF TENTS, ETC.

Mr. HAWLEY. The joint resolution (H. Res. 188) authorizing the loan of tents and camp equipage to the veteran organizations of the Society of the Army of the Potomac came over from the House of Representatives a short time ago. It relates to the loan of tents and camp equipage for the celebration at Gettysburgh. I wish to make a statement in regard to it which will dispose of it, and I wish to put that statement upon record that there may be no misapprehension about it.

The Senate on the 20th of June concurred in a House joint resolution precisely identical in terms and the matter is concluded, the President having signed the joint resolution and the work being in progress. I do not know how it happens that the House of Representatives has just passed it over again and it comes here to-day. I make this statement that there may seem to be no disrespect or negligence in the Senate paying no attention to it. The matter is all done; it was done nine days ago.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ALLISON. It is manifest that many of the appropriation bills can not be passed during to-day and to-morrow, and therefore I report back from the Committee on Appropriations the joint resolution (H. Res. 187) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, and I give notice that to-morrow morning I shall ask to have it considered.

Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. BECK, and others. Have it passed now.

Mr. ALLISON. Senators around me suggest that I ask unanimous consent to have the joint resolution considered to-day. I will ask that consent now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution just reported may be now considered by the Senate, the pending business being informally laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That all appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws which shall remain unprovided for on the 30th day of June, 1888, be, and they are hereby, continued and made available for a period of thirty days from and after that date, unless the regular appropriations therefor provided for in bills now pending in Congress shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889; and in case the appropriations, or any of them, hereby continued are or is insufficient to carry on the said necessary operations, a sufficient amount amount is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry on the same: Provided, That no greater amount shall be expended therefor than will be in the same proportion to the appropriations of the fiscal year 1888 as thirty days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year: Provided further, That authority is also granted for continuing during the same period the necessary work required for public printing and binding, and for all other miscellaneous objects embodied in the sundry civil, Army, District of Columbia, legislative, executive, and judicial, and naval appropriation acts, in advance of appropriations to be hereafter made for said objects: And provided further, All sums expended under this act shall be charged to and be deducted from the appropriations for like service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to interfere with the business of the Committee on Appropriations, but the effect of the joint resolution will be that in regard to every branch of the public service that is not appropriated for by to-morrow night a new account will have to be opened of one-twelfth of all the appropriations of the present year, and the accounts must run for thirty days. As a matter of course, the accounts must be opened separately, as for a new appropriation for thirty days.

It seems to me it would be a great deal better to run along even for a week without paying out any money from the Treasury for the ordinary current expenses of the Government than to pass the joint resolution. Its passage would be a very serious embarrassment to the Departments. If Congress should fail to make appropriations for one week, nobody would be injured, because no money need be paid. The expenses for the present fiscal year are provided for by existing law, and can be paid out, and even if no payments are made for ten days of next year that is a great deal better than to open two separate books of accounts which will run for thirty days on every item of expenditure not provided for by the appropriation bills already passed, while if the Committee on Appropriations would hold back the joint resolution for a week or so and let it stand probably most of the appropriation bills named would be out of the way.

Mr. ALLISON. A few years ago there was a provision inserted in one of the appropriation bills to the effect that no head of an Executive Department should accept the services of any clerk or employé unless a prior appropriation had been made for the purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will you kindly refer to that law?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to see it. If there is such a law it ought to be repealed.

Mr. TELLER. I think it was passed in 1883 or 1884. There is such a provision of law. It prohibits the head of a Department from accepting services where there has been no appropriation made. A failure to pass this joint resolution would simply suspend all the operations of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would repeal that law.

Mr. TELLER. It ought to be repealed, undoubtedly.

Mr. ALLISON. It is the law of 1884.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Colorado what the object was in passing such a provision of law. Was it not intended as a notice that appropriations must be made thereafter during the current year for the next fiscal year?

Mr. TELLER. I can not answer the Senator from Connecticut, because I was not a member of this body when it was passed. I was a member of the Government in another Department, and I know the question was presented to me directly whether, on a failure of appropriations, the Department over which I presided would shut up shop or not, and I determined that if there was a failure of appropriations I would shut up shop and not attempt to do any business. I suppose it was passed for the purpose of preventing the different Departments from doing what they sometimes did—accept services where the appropriations were insufficient and thus create a deficiency. I suppose it was done to cover some such case as that. For instance, in the Interior Department at one time when a certain land office had been burned up, the Department was compelled either to close the land office, a very large land office, or to put some volunteer employés at work to transcribe the records from the General Land Office to be furnished to the local land office. Quite an item of expense was thus made without the authority of law. It was made because there seemed to be an absolute necessity for it. The law might have been passed to cover some such case as that, or it might have been, as suggested, for the purpose of compelling the appropriation bills to be passed in ample time. At all events, there is such a statute somewhere on the statute-book, unless it has been repealed within the last three years.

Mr. SHERMAN. It may have been a provision for a single year.

Mr. TELLER. No; it was a general provision.

Mr. PLATT. My recollection about it is not very distinct, but my recollection is that at a former session of Congress we were confronted just at the end of the fiscal year by the fact that seven months' time had elapsed from the commencement of the Congress, and the appropriation bills had not been forwarded to the Senate in time to act upon them before the commencement of the next fiscal year. A joint resolution like the one under consideration was passed extending the period fifteen days, and when the fifteen days were about expiring another joint resolution had to be passed extending the appropriations for another fifteen days, and I am not sure but that there was a third extension in order to have the appropriation bills passed for the next fiscal year. My recollection may be imperfect, but my impression is that under those circumstances the Senate then introduced this clause in one of the appropriation bills, and that it was put there as a distinct notice that this kind of a resolution was not good legislation, and that it ought to cease.

It seems to me that whenever we find ourselves in this situation we ought to emphasize our opinion that the appropriation bills ought not to be delayed in this manner. I wish to say that I do not intend any criticism upon the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. At the very commencement of this session we undertook to emphasize the opinion of this body that the appropriation bills ought to be furnished to the Senate in time so that they could be passed during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June. The Committee on Rules reported an amendment to the rules providing that no appropriation bill should be considered until, I think, seven days after it had been sent to the Senate, and that resolution and that report of the Committee on Rules is now, if I am not mistaken, on our Calendar. It came up for consideration and this matter was alluded to, and it was suggested that perhaps the fact that the Committee on Rules had reported such an amendment would cure the evil, and we should have no further necessity for it, and it remains now upon our Calendar under those circumstances.

Either the appropriation bills have not been reported in time to pass them before the 30th of June or they have been reported so late that it has been necessary for the committees to sit nights and all night, and for the Senate to sit evenings and all night in order to hurry the appropriation bills through.

It can not be possible that the appropriation bills can not be prepared and passed before the 30th of June. In the short session we have but three months, and the appropriation bills are prepared and passed during those three months; but when we have a long session, which may extend seven or eight months, we invariably find ourselves in such a position that the appropriation bills are not ready for action on the 30th day of June. I am not particularly familiar with the operations of the Government, but I can see that, as the Senator from Ohio says, every account which is made necessary, except in the case of the appropriation bills which shall become laws to-morrow, will have to be opened anew.

Mr. SHERMAN. For thirty days.

Mr. PLATT. For thirty days, and there is no assurance that we may not have to extend the appropriations for a period beyond thirty days. The appropriation bills are now in such a shape that, judging by the past, it is fair to assume that on the 30th day of July all the appropriation bills will not be through. It involves the opening of an account consisting of one-twelfth of the appropriations of the preceding year.

Mr. SHERMAN. On every item.

Mr. PLATT. On every item, for thirty days, and all warrants have to be drawn against that account, and that account is to be closed and a new one opened at the end of the thirty days.

Mr. President, I do not know how much it will embarrass the operations of the Government not to pass the joint resolution. Of course the Government must go on in some way, but if it is a mere matter of paying out money next week or the week after——

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all it is.

Mr. PLATT. If that is all it is, I think we had better not pass the joint resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. The statute to which I referred is found in the urgent deficiency act passed in 1884.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Page 17, of volume 23, of the Statutes at Large.

Mr. ALLISON. It is as follows:

> And hereafter no Department or officer of the United States shall accept voluntary service for the Government, or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property.

That applies to a very large class of cases. Of course it does not apply to the entire civil service; but nearly all persons in the employ of the Government now, such, for example, as the Pension Office clerks—I merely mention them by way of illustration—are not authorized by any other law except the appropriation acts from year to year, providing for that service for the fiscal year. So I think under this statute the civil service of the Departments here would be absolutely stopped, or nearly so.

Mr. PLATT. The joint resolution goes to the extent of extending appropriations for all miscellaneous objects embodied in the sundry civil bill as well as the Army, the District of Columbia, the legislative, executive, and judicial, and naval appropriation acts in advance of the appropriations to be hereafter made.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one clause in the joint resolution which makes new appropriations for all objects that may be deemed necessary, leaving to the executive authorities for the time being the absolute control of the whole Treasury of the United States, if according to their judgment they think it necessary. It seems rather a dangerous power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We all agree that the military and naval establishment is not within this clause in the joint resolution, and I do not agree with the Senator from Iowa that the civil establishment is within it. Take the clerks for illustration. It is suggested by him that the clerks in the Departments exist only by force of the appropriation acts. I do not agree to that proposition. Their pay depends upon appropriation acts, but their existence depends upon their appointment by the head of the Department under the authority of the present Revised Statutes of the United States, which set up the Treasury establishment and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint clerks and to carry on the whole establishments; and so of other heads of Departments. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prescribe regulations, etc., for the government of his Department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, and the distribution and performance of its business, etc. Then the law provides how they shall be appointed and classified; that they shall be arranged in four classes, and so on. So the administrative authority to appoint clerks in the Treasury Department under the limitations and classifications named exists just as it does to appoint a lieutenant in the Army of the United States in the Army establishment.

Mr. PLATT. Would they have a claim for their pay?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is another thing. This act that my friend has referred to as something to show that the whole Government would be paralyzed and fall to pieces in point of its capacity to do anything is the point to which I am addressing myself. That is clearly incorrect in my opinion, and my position is made still more clear by the subsequent sections of the Revised Statutes, which forbid the expenditure of any more money in the payment of these clerks and employés, who exist by force of this standing law, than has been appropriated for those purposes.

That being the state of the case, as it appears to me clear, the Government will go on in all its organized departments whether it has any money or not to pay in a week or two, and pay-day only comes once a month, on the 1st of every month. It will be the 1st of August before there will be any necessity to pay anything to any person in the service of the Government. It may be necessary, as they have money enough over, and it does not lapse until two years, to buy ice and so on. In respect of mere incidental supplies, purchases, etc., for which there is no money available, they can not purchase, because there is a prohibition against making contracts between the Government officers and the people with whom they deal in advance of the money which Congress shall have appropriated to pay them.

Mr. ALLISON. Take for illustration the point made by the Senator from Vermont. Suppose the Post-Office Department has exhausted its appropriation for the current fiscal year, as it undoubtedly has, because we have had several deficiencies already; how will the postage-stamps, envelopes, and various services of that kind be carried on unless there is an appropriation therefor? How can the Postmaster-General make a contract, say, for postage-stamps?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think he can, unless he has money under the existing appropriation act to do so, or has made his contract, as undoubtedly he has before this time, for a sufficient supply of postage-stamps to last from now until the 1st of August. It is perfectly obvious that the Postmaster-General has not brought his postage contracts and his supply of postage-stamps down to the 1st day of July, 1888, but that he has a supply on hand large enough to run his Department for a month. They do business on a large scale.

Then my friend refers to his being short because we have had so many deficiency bills. One would suppose that the deficiency bills, which were intended to help out for a whole fiscal year, had given him a supply to stock himself long enough to run later than to-morrow night.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont how he proposes to provide for the laborers and others employed in the arsenals and navy-yards of the United States under the general appropriating clauses for that purpose?

Mr. CHACE. Before the Senator from Vermont answers that question I should like to ask——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. As I know, there are large numbers of such employés, who depend upon the annual appropriations, who are not provided for by any law as a part of the existing force of the United States, and who can not be employed but must be discharged if the appropriations are not extended. Their services can not be accepted even if they are willing voluntarily to give them, unless the head of the Department, the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, declares that there is an instant emergency involving loss of human life or destruction of property. I ask the Senator from Vermont how he would provide for those persons?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will answer in a moment, but yield to my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], who wishes to ask a triangular question of my friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHACE. Before we pass from the other subject, in reply to the question that the Senator from Iowa asked the Senator from Vermont, I should like to inquire if we did not in the deficiency appropriation act passed the present year make an appropriation of $87,000 to pay a firm in Connecticut for envelopes, and does not that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. ALLISON. We did, but the payment was made under a contract.

Mr. CHACE. Was not that contract made after the law was passed?

Mr. ALLISON. It was made in absolute violation of law, as the Postmaster-General admitted in the printed letter which may be found in our files.

Mr. CHACE. But does not that demonstrate that there is a practical way for the Postmaster-General to get along?

Mr. TELLER. By violating the law.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let us have the correct history of the matter. There was no violation of law.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the question.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will tell the Senate exactly how it stood. The envelopes ran out because this economical Democratic Administration prefers to pay $900 on a thousand-dollar debt and the other hundred dollars another time. That is the way it prefers to do business. The envelopes ran out. The manufacturer said: "Mr. Postmaster-General, I know the law as well as you do. You can not contract with me. There can be no obligation." "Quite so," said the Postmaster-General. "Notwithstanding," said the other man, "I will go on and help your Government out, and furnish these envelopes for two or three months." The Postmaster-General said, "I can not promise to pay you." "Quite so; I understand that; I will just take my chances;" and he borrowed the money, and raised $87,000, and went on and did the work knowing that there was no legal obligation and without asking anybody to incur any; and we had to override the Committee on Appropriations in order to get the money for him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think I shall resume the floor. In the first place, I will answer my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] on the subject of the persons in the arsenals. If those are extra persons, taken on temporarily, above and beyond the regular force authorized by law in the arsenal establishments, then the Senator would be right, and they would have to be dismissed, as they ought to be dismissed, because they ought not to have been taken on and carried on beyond the time that the money ran out. But if they are regular employés in that Department under its regular establishment, then they stand just like everybody else, and they are not rendering voluntary service; they are not volunteers, but they continue, just as the soldiers did in the Army whose time of enlistment had run out, because the fight was going on and they had not any convenient way voluntarily to retire, because they had to get a discharge and so on. So much for that.

Now, let us see exactly what the act of 1884 means. I will read the whole of the clause, and you will then see exactly how it came in and to what it applies:

INDIAN OFFICE.

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the employés temporarily employed and rendering service in the Indian Office from January 1 up to July 1, 1884, $2,100; and hereafter no Department or officer of the United States shall accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law, except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property.

I infer from that statute, although I do not remember the circumstances, that beyond and above the regular authorized legal establishment in the Interior Department and in the Indian Office, the Secretary of the Interior thought it for the public interest to employ a certain number of persons whom the law before had not provided for, entirely outside of and extraneous to the regular force, for what he thought was a public interest, and he then called on Congress to pay those people. Congress said, "We will pay them, but hereafter we forbid you or any other head of a Department to employ people whose employment is not authorized by law. Those were temporary people, and we are not going to have any more of that sort of business done. If you can not get on with the regular force that Congress provides for you in its Revised Statutes of systematic organization and such temporary assistants as appropriations may give you for that one year alone, then so far you must suspend business." It was a very correct statute, but in my humble judgment, with great respect to everybody else, it has no application whatever to the regular and systematic force that is carrying on the civil and military and naval government of the United States.

So we are only confronted with the simple proposition that we shall make haste now, when several of the appropriation bills are just about to become laws in two, or three, or four, or five, or eight days, to extend all the appropriations of the fiscal year now about to expire, some of which will not be again made, for objects that will have effectuated all their purposes and no money is wanted for them. We extend those last by the general phraseology of the joint resolution, and put the whole of the machinery and the whole of the expenditure of the last annual appropriations on for an indefinite period of time within the thirty days. That ought not to be done unless there is an extreme emergency that requires it. As I say, there may be no money already appropriated to pay until the 1st of August, but there is time enough before then to clean up probably all of these appropriation bills. There ought to be time enough.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Vermont is mistaken in supposing that these clerks and employés are appointed by general law. They are appointed under the provisions of appropriation acts, appropriating for so many clerks in each Department each year, and they can only be maintained in office during that year. For instance, take the appropriations of 1886. For the office of Assistant Attorney-General in the Interior Department appropriation was made for three law clerks, one at $2,750, one at $2,500, one at $2,250, five clerks at $2,000 each, one clerk of class 3, one clerk, who shall act as stenographer, at $1,600; in all, $27,700. If that appropriation failed to be repeated the next year, those people would go out at the end of the year. Everybody understands that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand it.

Mr. TELLER. That is a fact in administration which the Senator could readily understand. If he would telephone down to the Department he would find that is the case; and there are Senators here who must know that such is the fact.

You may take the General Land Office. The Commissioner of the General Land Office is provided for by general statute. I want to say that it is not true of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, but of some officers it has been true that the salary is one thing by statute and another by appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I interrupt my friend on the Department of Justice, which he took for illustration?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We want to get at the true state of this business. I find in the standing law, the United States Revised Statutes—pretty old, to be sure, and the establishment has been somewhat increased, I dare say—a provision that there shall be in the Department of Justice one chief clerk, giving the salary—I shall condense as much as I can—one law clerk, one stenographic clerk, one disbursing clerk. In the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, which is part of the same thing, it is provided that there shall be one chief clerk and such temporary clerks as from time to time may be needed, but the allowance for such temporary clerks shall in no one year exceed $1,000 each.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator has given much attention to the question of the appointment of these clerks. The former method was to appropriate for each Department a certain amount of money under the statutes. Then they went to work and parceled them out just exactly as the head of the Department saw fit, giving a clerk $1,000, or $1,200, or $1,500. That was the original method except in the case of a few clerks designated. There are four clerks in the Interior Department now appointed by the President of the United States under the old law, performing the same duty that clerks who are appointed by the Secretary perform. Those are established clerks; their position is fixed by law. What I read was not in the Department of Justice but in the Interior Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Senator to refer to the Department of Justice, to the office of the Attorney-General.

Mr. TELLER. No; I referred to the office of the Assistant Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior. Every Department of the Government has an Assistant Attorney-General assigned from the Department of Justice to that Department. In making the appropriations for that Department the appropriations are made for the clerks in that office, but they are appropriations made under the head of the Department of the Interior or whatever Department it may be.

I will venture to say that in the Pension Office 90 per cent. of the clerks there are provided for only by appropriation acts. They cease at the end of the year and they are never the same. There are some of one class this year who are not in the next, and so on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all true; but that is merely done by the appropriation act. It does not legislate; it recognizes the existence of the system, and it gives just as much money as Congress chooses to pay the clerks.

Mr. TELLER. It does not recognize the system. It establishes the office and provides that there shall be so many clerks of class 1, and so many clerks of class 2, so many of class 3 and class 4, and it makes the appropriations for those clerks; and the moment that the appropriation ceases they are out of office. That is the practical result, and that will be the practical result with a very large proportion of these clerks if there is no appropriation available on the 1st of July.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask a question? I suppose that nobody becomes a clerk in the Pension Office or in any Department until he or she receives a notification that he or she has been appointed clerk in class 1 or class 2, as the case may be. If that appointment lasts only for a year, does that clerk at the end of the year get another notification that he or she has been again appointed? According to the Senator that clerk is out of office at the end of the year.

Mr. TELLER. He is out of office.

Mr. PLATT. How do they go on and draw their pay, then?

Mr. TELLER. He is out of office unless the appropriation act again provides for him. If the appropriation act provides for one hundred clerks of class 1 this year, and next year appropriates for fifty clerks of class 1, fifty go out of office in the practical operation of the Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which fifty?

Mr. TELLER. The fifty whom the Secretary selects.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then none go out until he selects?

Mr. TELLER. He selects them beforehand if he is an executive officer who understands his business.

Mr. PLATT. It is not that the Secretary does not reappoint them, but the Secretary at the end of the year gives them notice that their services are no longer required, and removes them.

Mr. TELLER. No, he does not remove them, because he has no power to do so. It is a question which has been much discussed in the Departments whether they should be reappointed. In some of the Departments they have been reappointed and in others they have been allowed by a formal order to continue. Senators are but dealing with a mere technicality when they talk upon that subject. They know that no executive officer in this Government dare to keep a clerk there who is not appropriated for, although the office is established by law. There is a statute which makes it a misdemeanor for him to do it. There is a statute now in force which confronts every head of a Department, providing that he must not expend a dollar that is not appropriated for.

The Senator from Vermont says that they can keep on and let the Administration run; they can do it in defiance of law; but is it necessary, is it proper that in order to avoid a little trouble in book-keeping we should ask every executive officer of the Government to violate the plain provisions of a statute? It is a good deal better that they should be inconvenienced in their book-keeping than that that should be done.

The practical result, as everybody knows, is, if we do not pass the joint resolution, that we have failed to legislate to keep in office a great number of people and they will be out of office. They must be reappointed; they must pass the civil-service examination again, and go through all the troubles they have gone through with to get in. I do not know that I have a great deal of interest in keeping many of those people in, but I know, and everybody ought to know, that it would be better for us to pass the joint resolution, so as not to create confusion of the greatest kind and character in the administration of the affairs of the Government. Its defeat can only be defended upon the theory that we want to punish the House of Representatives. We do not punish the House of Representatives because they did not send their bills here in time. I do not suppose they care any more about the confusion that results than we do. We punish ourselves quite as much as we punish the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to call attention to section 3679 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I saw it.

Mr. ALLISON. Which the Senator from Vermont looked at and did not read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not read two others in the same connection.

Mr. ALLISON. Section 3679 provides that—

No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

That is one provision.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then section 3732 is another one.

Mr. ALLISON. So the statutes are full of various provisions in this regard. It may be that a dozen or two clerks in the Department of Justice could be retained under the statutory provisions already cited; but it is nevertheless true that the entire civil force of our Government practically is carried on through appropriation acts and in no other way. I will take the office of the Public Printer, and I make the prediction now that if we do not pass the sundry civil appropriation bill, in which the appropriation is usually made for the Government Printing Office, by to-morrow night, on Monday morning the Government Printing Office will be closed up or else the Government Printer will be violating the law. That is the existing condition of things. I regret it just as much as other Senators do.

Mr. PLATT. Would he be in office still?

Mr. ALLISON. I presume he would be in office still, and there would be three clerks in his office, because they are provided for by law, and they are the only persons there who are so provided for. It might be a wise thing, as some Senators suggest, to make a change in that office by refusing to make the appropriations, but that is not a very honorable way to carry on the Government, in my judgment.

This joint resolution is carefully guarded. It provides, in the first place—

That all appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws which shall remain unprovided for on the 30th day of June, 1888, be, and they are hereby, continued and made available for a period of thirty days.

Therefore it gives no discretion to the Executive Departments beyond the necessary service under existing law. When you come to miscellaneous service or objects the joint resolution is guarded especially, because it provides—

That authority is also granted for continuing during the same period the necessary work required for public printing and binding, and for all other miscellaneous objects embodied in the sundry civil, Army, District of Columbia, legislative, executive, and judicial, and naval appropriation acts, in advance of appropriations to be hereafter made for said objects.

Of course that contemplates that the Executive Departments will take notice of the provisions in these bills as they now stand, and they can not go an inch beyond them. I remember perfectly well, and the Senator from Ohio undoubtedly has in his mind the fact, that in 1877 there was no appropriation for the Army. President Hayes did not call an extra session of Congress at once, and the Army ran along for three or four months without any appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Several of the other bills ran over for some time, but we did not have any extension.

Mr. ALLISON. The Army bill was the only appropriation bill that failed that year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me, I am quite sure that we were in the same category precisely then that we are now as to two or three other bills besides the Army bill, and that we went far beyond the 1st of July, and nobody was dismissed or anything of that kind.

Mr. ALLISON. I remember no such instance as stated by the Senator from Vermont. I have not the statutes before me, as of course I did not anticipate this discussion. We have frequently and repeatedly passed these continuing statutes from time to time. It is a matter of no moment to me personally, as it is not to the Committee on Appropriations, whether this joint resolution shall go through or not.

If the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] would exhaust himself a little bit on the House of Representatives instead of making a fling at the Committee on Appropriations in respect to the particular appropriation to which he alluded, he might employ himself more profitably. The particular appropriation alluded to by the Senator from Connecticut was presented to the House of Representatives by Mr. Vilas, who was then Postmaster-General, and he stated in his letter to the committee, which can be found and read, that he had practically violated the statutes of the United States in order that the Post-Office Department might not stop. It is true they whipped the individual around the stump, as the Senator from Connecticut so beautifully illustrated in his statement.

I could convict a man upon the statement of the Senator from Connecticut of violating the law. The Committee on Appropriations had an urgent deficiency bill. The House committee had stated that they had excluded the item after an explanation of the matter by Postmaster-General Vilas, and it was important that that particular bill should be passed the day it was reported. The Committee on Appropriations did not embody the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut in the bill, but by the courtesy of that committee the Senator from Connecticut was authorized to offer the amendment, and he did offer it, and it was passed. There was no special objection to it. So I think whatever blame there is attached to that particular matter it should go beyond this body.

I believe that on the 2d day of July we shall find that several of these important appropriation bills will not have become laws.

Mr. PLATT. How many of them have become laws?

Mr. ALLISON. Only three of them are laws now, out of fourteen. If I were at the head of one of these Departments, I should not violate the law, as every one of them will do if he goes on expending money not authorized by law and not appropriated for.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator a question. As a legal proposition his statement has excited my curiosity. I understood him to say that upon the statement of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] he could convict the former Postmaster-General, now the Secretary of the Interior, of having violated the law. I understood the statement to be that Mr. Vilas distinctly stated to the manufacturer of envelopes that he had no authority to contract with him; that the law positively forbade it; and that the man said, "Very good; I will furnish the articles and take my chances of the Government paying me hereafter." Does the Senator mean to say that he could convict the Postmaster-General on that statement?

Mr. PLUMB. If he fixed the price.

Mr. VEST. The price had been already fixed by the former contract.

Mr. ALLISON. Not on the particular envelopes, because there was no law for them.

Mr. VEST. I want to know from the Senator how he could convict a Cabinet officer on that statement.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think I could wish to do so.

Mr. VEST. I do not think you would.

Mr. ALLISON. The Postmaster-General received these envelopes and sent them day by day to the postmasters of the country for daily use, and as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] says, they were charged and the account made out.

Mr. VEST. How did that violate the statute? Suppose any citizen of this country comes and says: "I will trust the faith and honor of this Government. It is true that Congress has failed to make the proper appropriation, but I will furnish these goods and I will take the chances on the natural, general equity that I shall afterwards be paid." I should like to see any one who would say that that was a violation of law.

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps I made a mistake in that statement. The statute prohibits any head of a Department accepting any voluntary service without an appropriation. I do not say that the Government itself would stop. I do not believe that. Of course it would go on; but merely on account of a little inconvenience to the clerks in the Treasury Department in adjusting these appropriations I do not think it is wise for us to subject the heads of Departments to the serious inconvenience of carrying on their Departments in violation of law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he thinks the only objection to this way of doing business is the inconvenience to the clerks in the Departments in making up the accounts?

Mr. ALLISON. No, I did not say so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know the Senator did not.

Mr. ALLISON. I mean to say that we are confronted here, on the 29th day of June, one day before the expiration of the fiscal year, by a lack of appropriations to carry on the Government, and if it is carried on in many of its branches after to-morrow it will be carried on in the face of absolute statutes. That is what I say, and I mean to say that it is the fault of the two Houses of Congress that the appropriations have not been made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I wish to ask the Senator as one member of this body and as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is, if this method of carrying on the business of the Government is a bad one, not merely in the inconvenience of the clerks of the United States but in its principles and in its broad and general practice, when are we going to begin to stop it? Is there to be a continual recurrence to the same methods, or are we going to say that we will face it once for all and see if we can not persuade our friends at the other end of the Capitol, if they assume the sole right to originate appropriation bills, that they must send them over in time to have them considered and got through, so as to have the Government go on regularly, and if they do not choose to do it, suffer whatever inconvenience from their failure to do their part of the work, or are we to continue on forever in this way?

Mr. ALLISON. That is a question which addresses itself to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am asking the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations did not feel that it could take the responsibility, and as chairman of that committee I do not think I ought to take it, nor as an individual Senator do I think I ought to take it; but if other Senators differ from me, let them vote down the joint resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I for one am perfectly willing to take the responsibility myself, and I think the Senate should put an end to this practice which has sprung up of late years. Under the old laws as they existed several years ago, the balances of appropriations could be applied to the payment of the current expenses of the next fiscal year. Congress has seen proper in the last fifteen or twenty years to make these severely restrictive laws on the use of appropriations.

There was great difficulty in Mr. Hayes's administration on account of the failure to pass the Army appropriation bill at one time. Army officers had to borrow money from bankers in order to pay their current expenses from the beginning of the fiscal year until some time in January. I am perfectly willing now to take the responsibility, for one, of saying that we should pass these appropriation bills as rapidly as possible, and sit here night and day, and abandon and discontinue, forever I trust, this process of making appropriations in this haphazard way, which makes a complication of accounts, gives great powers to the Executive Departments, and embarrasses the fiscal operations of the Government.

We are continuing under this resolution a set of appropriations not applicable to the next fiscal year. Many of them have fallen and their force is spent, and their object has been accomplished, and some of them are not needed for the next fiscal year. In the orderly way of conducting the business of the Government there can be no great inconvenience from a failure to pass the joint resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me finish. All the officers are continued. There is no inconvenience about it. Every employé of this Government can receive his pay up to the 30th day of June whether he applies for it before or after, because all appropriations are available to pay for the expenses of the last fiscal year. No payments are required under the ordinary operations of the Government for fourteen days after the beginning of the next month.

Mr. TELLER. What are they expected to do?

Mr. HARRIS. Perhaps the question I wanted to ask the Senator from Ohio has already been answered; it is this: Can the head of any one of the Executive Departments continue the services of any employé in any one of those Departments, incurring a liability to pay money, under the existing statutes as they now are?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think they can. I think the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has fully explained that. The ordinary operations of the Government go on. These men are employed not for a particular time, though the appropriation is made for a particular time. Nothing is limited but the appropriation. The money appropriated for this year can not be applied next year, but the employés of the Government now in the service will go on in the Printing Office and everywhere else. I have no doubt of it. There is no limit to their employment.

Mr. HARRIS. I unfortunately was not in the Senate when the Senator from Vermont spoke; but as I read the statutes I should very seriously doubt, indeed I incline strongly to the opinion, that the head of no Department of this Government can incur the liability to pay a dollar for the services of any employé until the appropriations have been made.

Mr. SHERMAN. He does not incur any liability. The Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of the Treasury makes no contract whatever. These men continue in the employment in which they are now engaged. They are not hired for a particular time.

Mr. HARRIS. Is there no implied contract that they shall be paid the salaries that are fixed by law?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me get through. I say there is no such implied contract. A man is employed under the existing law without any fixed time. It is true the appropriation expires and that is the end of the appropriation, and until Congress again appropriates money no money can be paid an employé; but is it not better that these executive officers should suffer a little inconvenience, even if they are delayed in the payment of their compensation, rather than that we should disarrange the whole operations of the Government in this irregular and improper manner? That is what I claim. I do not believe that it need disturb any of the ordinary operations of the Government. The people who are now employed in the public service in the Government Printing Office can go on and perform their duty, but they can not get their pay. The only restriction is that no money shall be taken out of the Treasury of the United States except in pursuance of appropriations made by law.

Mr. HARRIS. Or liability incurred.

Mr. SHERMAN. True.

Mr. HARRIS. Now, does the Senator say that it is a matter of no consequence that the head of a Department shall commit a misdemeanor by violating an explicit statute in incurring a liability to pay, and when the appropriations are made paying exactly what the law condemns?

Mr. SHERMAN. How can the head of a Department incur a liability when he makes no appointment, makes no employment?

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. The clerks remain in office just as the officers of the Army remain in office.

Mr. HARRIS. That is exactly the point. Here is a man appointed to perform a given class of duties and for a given salary, the appropriation has expired, the statute forbids the head of the Department to incur any liability for services, but he allows the man to go on and perform the service, and subsequently he pays him for it. There is no express contract of course, but if the head of the Department allows the employé to go on in the performance of his duties, and when the appropriations are made pays for the services according to the salary fixed by law, can it be denied that so far as an implied contract is concerned there is one?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no such thing as an implied contract with the Government of the United States. A person is employed in pursuance of law, not for any fixed period of time, but upon the presumption that Congress will do its duty; and all these contracts are made upon that presumption. If Congress fails to do its duty, no money can be taken out of the Treasury and paid for this employment; no money can be paid for your salary or mine, or that of the President of the United States, or for any clerk or employé until there is an appropriation for it. That is all there is about it. The contract exists, and the employment continues. My friend from Colorado asks, will the clerk perform his duty? If he does not, let him be dismissed or go out.

Mr. TELLER. He is willing to perform it if he gets a chance, but you say he shall not have the opportunity.

Mr. SHERMAN. He will be there at his desk and will be working away.

Mr. TELLER. It will be a violation of the law if he does.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it will be. I think if we would take the position firmly that until the appropriations are made in the regular way the money shall not be paid out, then we shall have an end of this business, and we shall have the appropriation bills brought to us in time and passed in time.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I am as hostile as any one can be to the system by which the Senate or the House of Representatives is placed at a disadvantage in the proper consideration of appropriation bills; and in general it may be said that the fault is not with the Senate. Nevertheless there is a consumption of time in debate and a difference of opinion in the Senate as to our power of amendment to the appropriation bills which can not be imputed to the House of Representatives as a fault. It is a fault in ourselves. Now, if any proper legislation or if any political morals can correct this mischief, it must be done by appropriate, adequate, and seasonable provision; and now on this 29th day of June, the fiscal year expiring to-morrow, we are confronted with the problem whether we can deal with the question freely without incurring and exposing others to greater responsibility than this protraction and delay in the presentation of appropriation bills by the other House.

I understand, differing in this regard from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], that the difficulty about the clerks all over these Departments, except such as there is provision for in the general statutes, is that not only money for their payment, but the requisition of their existence rests on appropriation bills. The fact and the service makes the payment in one breath. Certain classes of clerks up to a certain number in the various Departments are provided for by the appropriation acts, and they provide for their existence and their term and their payment all in one word, and when that is exhausted there is no ground, there is no place to put them in, no place to keep them in, as well as no money to pay them with. The fiscal year expiring and the appropriations expiring, the places are vacant and there are no places in which to put them back until there is a creation of a term and a payment for them.

We then must deal with this matter practically. We can not at this late day of the year fail to see, as it seems to me, the very mischievous nature of the legislation which we are asked to adopt and which we should like to discontinue; but how are we to terminate it? Can there be any difference of opinion as to what the meaning of the act of 1884 is? We all know the restrictions that have been thrown over the Departments in regard to employés by the general legislation, and then there comes what no doubt was intended to be a blocking of the effort to delay appropriation bills by this final provision.

And hereafter no Department or officer of the United States—

Giving force, of course, to what was already in existence in the way of restriction—shall accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law, except in case of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property.

The Government must stand still; and it is a violation of law for the head of a Department to permit any of the clerks to yield voluntary service to the United States of America. It is impossible, then, as it seems to me, that at this stage we should regard the inconveniences of the proposed course to be as serious as are the mischiefs of delay in the appropriation bills. In this situation now, in this vortex, we are unable to repel or repair this mischievous system by undertaking to say that under these existing laws things shall be done illegally after the 30th day of June.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course, Mr. President, if the Senate desire to apply the heroic remedy suggested by the Senator from Ohio to the practice of passing appropriation bills so late in the fiscal year, there can be no objection to that; but it must not be imagined that the remedy can be applied without great injury to the public service and without great injury to individuals. The difficulty is not the prohibition against the head of a Department running the Government in debt or making a contract. The difficulty is the prohibition upon the head of a Department against accepting voluntary service even if offered, and that provision will discharge every laborer, every watchman, every man who is at work for day's wages in every Department of the Government where the annual appropriation bill does not become a law before next Monday. One of the bills that are not likely to become laws on the 30th day of June is the Naval appropriation bill, and I find by examining one of the regular Naval appropriation bills for a year that it is full of provisions for the employment of watchmen, of laborers, of men in humble employment, all of whom will cease to be employed on Monday next, none of whom can be allowed to work even if they voluntarily wish to work, and if they were to do so Congress can not pay them for working without sanctioning a violation of express law.

I will do no more than read the provisions for the Navy Department, to which my remarks are applicable.

The appropriations "for the civil establishment" of the Bureau of Ordnance is devoted to paying civil employés in the navy-yards, and in the act of 1881, for instance, there is $11,886.25 "for the Torpedo Corps;" for labor, $15,000; Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, for the civil establishment, $18,251.75; Bureau of Yards and Docks, for the civil establishment, $37,906.25; Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, "for the maintenance of the civil establishment at the several naval hospitals, navy-yards, naval laboratory, and Naval Academy, $40,000; Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, for civil establishment, $12,411.50; Bureau of Construction and Repair, for the civil establishment, $40,-105.75; Bureau of Steam-Engineering, for the civil establishment, $20,-038. At the Naval Academy there is an appropriation "for pay of watchmen and others," $24,455; "for pay of mechanics and others," $16,835.95; for pay of employés in the department of steam-engineering, $8,577.50, and so on to the extent of many thousands of dollars in addition. All of these moneys are paid out to mechanics, laborers, and watchmen, every one of whom must not work on Monday next if this resolution fails to become a law.

It is quite easy for Senators to stand here and say that the heads of Departments will go on and accept this voluntary service and take the risk; but I assure the Senator from Vermont that if he were the head of a Department, with a Senate of the United States as critics, as this Senate has sometimes been in the past in reference to the action of executive officers, it would be a long while before he would accept voluntary service in a Department which he should be conducting, after next Monday.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa, in speaking about the matter of the failure of the appropriation bills to pass, said that the responsibility was upon the Houses of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. If I used that phraseology, I meant to say that the responsibility is upon Congress; and I might have gone further and I will now go further and say that the responsibility is upon the House of Representatives, which fails to send these bills to us in time for their due consideration before the beginning of the new fiscal year.

Mr. PLUMB. I am glad to have given the Senator an opportunity to amend his statement. There are fourteen regular appropriation bills. Taking them in their alphabetical order, they are the agricultural; Army; diplomatic and consular; District of Columbia; fortification; Indian; legislative, executive, and judicial; Military Academy; naval; pensions; Post-Office; river and harbor; sundry civil; and deficiency. In the House of Representatives the responsibility for the preparation of these bills has been divided. The Agricultural Committee is responsible for the preparation and reporting and management in the House of the agricultural appropriation bill. The Military Affairs Committee has a similar responsibility in regard to the Army appropriation bill. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has a similar responsibility in regard to the diplomatic and consular bill. The Indian Committee has the charge of the Indian appropriation bill. The Military Committee has charge of the Military Academy appropriation bill. The Naval Committee has the preparation of the bill appropriating for the Navy. The pension bill is in the charge of the regular Committee on Appropriations, as are also the sundry civil bill; the legislative, executive, and judicial bill; the fortification bill, and the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia. The Post-Office Committee has charge of the Post-Office appropriation bill, and the River and Harbor Committee of the House has charge of the river and harbor bill. The regular Committee on Appropriations has charge of the deficiency bill.

It will be seen, therefore, that a majority of the important appropriation bills are in charge each of a single committee of the House of Representatives, a majority of the committees having to do with these appropriation bills having charge of one bill each and no more.

The first of these bills that was reported to the House of Representatives from any of these committees was the pension bill, reported on the 19th day of January, and which was passed by the House on the 20th day of April. It was reported to the Senate on the 10th day of May, and passed by the Senate on the 17th day of May. The Senate had that bill seven days from the time it was reported at the Secretary's desk to the time when, having been reported by the Appropriations Committee, it was amended and made ready to be presented to the President.

The next bill reported to the House was the diplomatic and consular bill, reported on the 7th of February from the Foreign Affairs Committee. It was passed by the House on the 21st day of May. It was reported to the Senate on the 4th day of June. It was passed by the Senate and returned to the House with amendments on the 6th day of June, the Senate having had the bill but two days before it took final action upon it.

The next of these appropriation bills which came before the House was the Post-Office appropriation bill, which was reported there on the 13th day of April. It was passed by the House on the 24th day of May. It was reported to the Senate on the 11th day of June, and on the 14th day of June, three days later, it passed the Senate.

The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was reported to the House on the 14th day of April and passed the House on the 1st day of June. It was reported to the Senate on the 25th day of June and was passed by the Senate on the 26th day of June, the Senate having had the bill for all purposes of its committee and action in the Senate only twenty-four days.

The Indian appropriation bill was reported to the House of Representatives on the 16th day of March, passed the House on the 20th of April, and passed the Senate on the 1st day of June. That bill has become a law.

The next appropriation bill reported in the House of Representatives was the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was reported on the 29th day of March. It passed the House on the 21st day of May, two months later; was reported to the Senate on the 11th day of June, and was passed by the Senate on the 13th day of June, two days later. That is still in conference.

The river and harbor bill was reported to the House on the 31st day of March, passed the House on the 7th day of May, and is now pending in the Senate.

The agricultural appropriation bill was reported to the House on the 28th day of May, passed the House on the 2d of June, was reported to the Senate from the Committee on Appropriations ten days later, on the 12th day of June, passed the Senate on the 14th day of June, and has not since been considered by the House until yesterday, when the amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in, and it came back to the Senate to-day with that message.

Congress met on the first Monday of December. The first bill that was reported to the House of Representatives from the Committee on Appropriations was on the 19th day of January following, and the last bill that was reported to the House of Representatives was on the 16th day of the present month. The House committees had these bills in charge before reporting them an average of more than four months from the date of the assembling of Congress until the time they were reported to the House and passed. The Senate has acted with unexampled rapidity upon all these bills so far as they have come here. They have been given as much consideration as they could in the time which has been available for the purpose; and yet I think every member of the Committee on Appropriations will say that more time was really needed in order that the committee might have given them that attention which they required. Every single effort consistent with even a fairly decent discharge of public duty has been made in order that these bills might be passed to take effect before the 1st day of July.

Unless it comes to be understood that the Senate shall abdicate all its functions in regard to appropriations there must be some other practice finally adopted, or we shall not only be met by the position with which we are confronted now constantly repeated and growing more aggravated at every Congress, but the time will come when we shall be confronted with still more serious difficulty, because it can not be supposed that the Senate will go on forever adopting makeshifts and temporary devices such as are proposed by the resolution now pending, leaving to the House of Representatives not only this ample time, but putting it in that condition in which it evinces a contempt for the Senate as a part of the legislative power of the country.

If the Senate can dispose of bills of this importance within a week or two weeks, or within three weeks at the outside—which I think is the longest time any of these bills have been in the Senate—the House ought certainly to be able to prepare and pass them in as many months. And yet, as I have stated, it takes an average of four months to prepare and pass in the House of Representatives a single appropriation bill.

Naturally, of course, this situation gives an excessive control to the House of Representatives of the appropriation bills. The bills come to us with such items on them as the House sees fit to put there. The Senate naturally, inevitably, and commonly amends them to conform to its own ideas of what is necessary for the discharge of its own duty and what is requisite for a continuation of the public service, and the bills go into conference; and there under the pressure of this brief time which must necessarily elapse, all the questions of difference between the two Houses are to be settled, and settled with a knowledge of the fact that unless they are settled within a very brief period of time there must necessarily be a lapse of the appropriations.

Something further has got to be done. There must be some rule whereby the House shall be required to discharge this most important public duty within a proper time, or the Senate must come finally to the point that it will not consider these bills unless they come within that proper time, and thereby allow the 1st day of July to go by without making the appropriations necessary to pay for the carrying on of the public service.

It is not very pleasant to criticise the House of Representatives, but something is due, not only to the Senate, but something is due to the fair and proper discharge of public obligations. Two years ago, under a belief, apparently, that more expedition would result from a division of duty and responsibility, the House of Representatives took away from its regular Appropriations Committee one-half of all the appropriation bills and gave to other committees the preparation of those bills. It committed to the Committee on Agriculture the agricultural appropriation bill; it committed to the Military Affairs Committee the Army appropriation bill; it committed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; it committed to the Indian Affairs Committee the Indian appropriation bill; it committed to the Military Affairs Committee the Military Academy appropriation bill; it committed to the Naval Committee the naval appropriation bill; and to the Post-Office Committee the Post-Office appropriation bill; and these committees, as any one will readily see, are not committees having engrossing duties of another character. I venture to say that no one of all these committees has reported more than two or three important bills outside of the appropriation bill committed to it; and yet, with each committee having only one appropriation bill, having no engrossing duties of another character, there is a greater delay than there was when all these bills were submitted to a single committee.

Perhaps I might go further and say, but I should hesitate to say it, though still I think it is in the line of that which our duty requires us to say, that this evidences the incapacity of the majority of the House of Representatives to deal with public measures promptly, sensibly, as they ought to be dealt with. The question is a pretty large one; it is a question to be considered elsewhere than here, probably during the coming summer; but these are the facts, that the House of Representatives, with this division of labor and under the control that it is now under and has been for years, is apparently unable to formulate and pass in time, in order that the Government may be properly carried on, the appropriation bills necessary for that purpose.

It will not do to say that there has been a tariff bill pending; that there have been other things to do, because these bills could all have been prepared long before the tariff bill ever saw daylight. The Senate, in whatever control politically it may be, is bound to consider, in view of its own responsibility for the carrying on of the Government, what will be necessary hereafter to prevent the contingency by which we are confronted now.

Mr. President, nothing could be more lax, more unsatisfactory, more prejudicial to good order than the passage of a resolution of this kind. Changes of appropriations become a necessity from year to year. New clerks are required in some branches of the Government, a diminution in another branch; new classes of expenditures in regard to public buildings, in regard to light-houses, and in regard to all the various classes of expenditures embraced in these fourteen different appropriation bills; there are changes necessary every year; and yet what do we do? We come in and say that the total this year shall be the same as in the laws of last year. This resolution says that wherever any of the clerks are provided for in the last appropriation bills he shall be continued for the next thirty days at the same salary, no matter whether his services are needed or not. It says also there shall be no increase in any direction in any Department of the Government which the necessities of the service may require, but whatever the condition of things was last year shall be continued. If we are to continue it for thirty days, why not for sixty days, and if for sixty days, why not for twelve months, so that all the same scale of expenditure and the same objects and purposes shall go on each year?

But, Mr. President, there is more than that. While we are now brought face to face with this failure of appropriations, we are reminded every day that scores and hundreds of bills affecting the expenditures of the Government, for the payment of the debts of the Government, bills necessary to meet changed conditions, bills essential as the appropriation bills themselves are to the perpetuity of the Government, have been passed by the Senate, and piled up on the table of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, where they receive not only no attention, but no pretense of attention, and there is no expectation either here or there that they ever will be attended to. We have come to that point where there is a practical embargo on legislation. We not only have to submit to the coat of last year, notwithstanding the growth of the necessity in regard to appropriations, but in regard to all other things on which legislation is desired we are compelled to labor under old conditions totally unsuited to the new and pressing needs of our people.

This is not the time, nor is it, perhaps, opportune to go into this subject more largely. At this moment, of course, whatever may be said, a bad motive will be ascribed to him who says it. It will be alleged that it is uttered because we are in a Presidential campaign; but it is proper at all times, and especially when an emergency of this kind arises, that there should be a full exposition of the condition of things which exists not only every year, but which becomes more and more aggravated, and which is bound, it seems to me, to result in a state of affairs much more serious than will be the result of a postponement of appropriations, and that will finally result in the delay of business, in a lack to meet new and pressing necessities, fruitful of the most important consequences.

I do not know what the Senate may be able to do that will effect a change. I was opposed in the early portion of this session to the adoption of the rule reported from the Committee on Rules by the Senator from Connecticut, to the effect that the Committee on Appropriations should not consider any appropriation bill not reported prior to six days from the expiration of the session—I believe that was the time named. I was opposed to that, because I could see that emergencies might arise in which that would work great harm to the Government, and yet it will take a catastrophe, and one perhaps of an overwhelming character, in order to work a reformation at the other end of this Capitol.

Mr. CALL. I can see no great evil consequences to result from the passage of the resolution. The argument of the Senator from Kansas denies the capacity of the people to elect their Representatives, or the capacity of those Representatives. These are the only two logical points of his propositions. By our form of government the House of Representatives is constituted with full discretion whether it will report an appropriation bill or any other bill at a particular date or time during the session or term of Congress. That is all there is to be said about it. If the people elect Representatives, as it is said they have done, for years who are incapable of performing their function, the indictment then is upon the people of the United States. I do not concur in either of these propositions.

Assuming that the fiscal year is to begin in July, which is neither a necessity nor a provision of the Constitution, and assuming that the session of Congress shall begin in December and end at some period of the summer, then we might say that the Senate would not have time to consider an appropriation bill unless the House should act by some particular time; but if the three hundred and thirty members in the performance of the constitutional duty required of them spend one hundred and fifty or three hundred days in the consideration of the appropriation of the money of this Government, it is their sovereign right and discretion to do so, and we have no right to impeach the methods of this performance of their duty.

Now, Mr. President, what evil to the country is it to appropriate money by an appropriation bill or by a joint resolution? Suppose it does inconvenience the clerical force of this country? What relation does that bear to the convenience and the sovereign right, power, and duty of the legislators representing the people to exercise their discretion as to time and methods in the performance of their functions. The failure of a hundred appropriation bills would not affect the even course and tenor of this great Government resting upon the affections of the people of this country.

What is this of which we complain and which we exaggerate and magnify so much here? It is the simple question of convenience to the clerks in keeping the accounting books of the Treasury. Suppose it to be true, as it is true, that every salary of this Government is by law made in contemplation of and subject to the express provisions of the Constitution that no money can be paid except by the act of Congress, be the law what it may, the appropriation is to be made by every succeeding Congress, unfettered and unlimited by the action of or the prohibition of any preceding Congress.

Suppose it to be true, as it is true, that no implied contract can rest upon this Government, that its powers are all mandatory, and that in their exercise it commands, and does not act by agreement or consent. Suppose all that to be true, and that the great sovereign principle of this Government is that the people every two years, by their representatives in the House of Representatives and those here assembled, shall have the sole and absolute power of imposing taxation and of disposing of the proceeds of taxation out of the Treasury of the United States, what then?

Why, Mr. President, it is comparatively of but little importance whether a general appropriation bill shall be passed on the 1st day of July or the Government carried on by a joint resolution. It does not affect in any respect the great public policy of this Government. It is well that the Senate should have its opportunity of considering every item of appropriation. It can take the time to do it if it chooses to do so. It can prolong the sessions of this body as long as it sees fit, for there can be no adjournment without its consent. There is therefore nothing in these propositions except the simple question of the convenience of these two bodies in their periods of adjournment and the termination of the session.

Mr. President, I agree with everybody else that there ought to be reasonably expeditious consideration of the appropriation measures, that it is a proper method of public business to unite them for the convenience of the Representatives and Senators in a general bill, not for any object of public policy, but to save time. That is all there is in the proposition, and certainly when we are required and the duty is imposed upon us to appropriate the money out of the Treasury with unlimited discretion as to the manner of appropriating, whether by single bill or resolution or by general appropriation bill, there can be no doubt that when the law is exhausted the obligation is imperative upon this body to make that appropriation in such form as is possible to be done within the time limited. Therefore I do not think there ought to be any two opinions on the subject of the passage of this joint resolution.

As to coercing the House of Representatives by a rule that unless they shall pass appropriation bills at a certain time the Senate will abdicate its functions and not pass them at all, it seems to me there can be no consideration of that proposition; and the whole question, therefore, is simply whether we shall perform a constitutional duty imposed upon us of appropriating money out of the Treasury to answer the public necessities and the public demands, or whether we shall refuse to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment seems to be necessary, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 13 strike out the word "amount" where it occurs the second time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] on which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOLPH. So much time has been consumed with the resolution just disposed of that I will reserve what I have to say on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to the Army appropriation bill to a later time in the consideration of the bill. I propose to offer an amendment to it. I will yield now to the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate but a few moments from the consideration and determination of this amendment if the Senate is ready to pass upon it. My only reason for speaking at all is lest it should be supposed that the State of New York and the city of New York were indifferent to any proper and prompt action toward putting this country in a state of defense.

As I understand, we have reached in consideration and examination by all competent sources of examination and report, to a general conclusion that this amendment is in its subject and its substance a proper piece of legislation. I believe that the objections which have been made do not at all touch the occasion of the public and of the Government requiring that provision should be made for furnishing armaments for forts that are already at the service of the Government or are to be built.

Now, Mr. President, as I understand it the real question for us to determine is this: Is there any such impediment in this measure being ingrafted upon an appropriation bill as should deter Congress from making it now an immediate piece of legislation? I do not understand that any of the general and conservative rules which should confine appropriation bills to appropriation matters give any ground to object to this measure. It has been suggested that the fortification bill when it comes would then be a more proper and a more regular place to dispose of the question, but I have not understood from any quarter, unless, perhaps, from the Senator from Maryland, that if this measure were here in a fortification bill any objection would be made to passing these clauses and sections thus found in that bill.

Mr. President, we are constantly brought in this attitude in legislation of agreeing that something ought to be done, that something ought to be promptly done, that something ought to be definitely done, and now we have reached by every stage of preliminary examination a condition to determine whether this measure is a good measure and should be accepted and adopted, and if we find that it is, and if we find that this is the promptest and the readiest mode of setting at work the purpose of this Government in regard to this armament of forts, I hope the Senate will find that there is no course for us to take but promptly and immediately to adopt this amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator will pardon me for a few words further.

An inquiry was made of me as to about how many tons or how many guns the $5,000,000 would secure. Of course it can only be approximately estimated now. Such forged steel costs $600 or $700 a ton, and the estimate is about as follows: 100 8-inch guns of 15 tons, 1,500 tons; 120 10-inch guns of 30 tons, 3,600 tons; 50 12-inch guns of 50 tons, 2,500 tons; making a total of 7,600 tons, and making 270 guns when completed. But it will take five or six years at least to expend the $5,000,000.

One point more. It has been said that the Ordnance Bureau had

$75,000 a year for many years out of the avails of obsolete guns and old material, the money being covered into the Treasury and $75,000 of it being set apart each year for, in the language of the statute—

The purpose of procuring a supply of material adapted in manufacture and caliber to the present forms of the service.

One would think perhaps that would be used to buy new types, but the law has been construed in a just and proper sense. Among the guns made under that are 3.2-inch steel guns, of which there have been, I think, thirty made and some more to be made. The statute contemplates that there shall be a standard gun made and tested thoroughly before guns of that kind shall be issued to the Army or put into the available list of guns.

The Ordnance Bureau has built a 5-inch siege gun, and a 7-inch howitzer, and an 8-inch rifle and twelve steel-hooped mortars, all breech-loading, and they are said to be unsurprssed by any guns of like caliber in the world. They are kept for testing and are standard guns. They have been subjected, except the siege pieces, to severe tests for endurance, under that appropriation.

The Department has now under manufacture at the Watervliet arsenal one 10-inch breech-loading steel gun, one 8-inch breech-loading steel gun, and twenty-five 3.2-inch breech-loading steel field guns.

This is a report of the Ordnance Office to the Secretary of War, dated June 19 of the present year.

This work was begun under authority of the general law (section 1164, page 209, Revised Statutes United States, second edition, 1878), which prescribes the duties of the Chief of Ordnance, under direction of the Secretary of War, with regard to the procurement of ordnance supplies for the use of the Army, etc.; and also of the Statutes at Large (seventh paragraph, page 388, United States Statntes at Large, volume 18, part 3), which provides a permanent appropriation from proceeds of sales of obsolete and unserviceable material, which I have referred to.

A single word more, because the Senator from Kentucky made a point against us here which I suppose may be assumed to have a little force unless it is noticed. He said that this was too important matter to be discussed now upon the Army appropriation bill at this late stage of the session. I rebel, I indignantly rebel against that objection. Why was not the Army bill here two months ago? Last year it was passed before the 4th of March. Why are we told year after year when these important bills come here in the very last days, "Do not put on your amendment; do not take up the time; it is important that this bill pass before the 1st of July?" I will not listen to that. It is my duty to propose the amendment in behalf of the Military Committee. I do it and urge it, and I should speak upon it until Monday morning next if I thought it was my duty to do so.

Then, again, it was intimated that we ought to try the fortification bill. Mind you, sir, the fortification bill is not even here in the Senate in the hands of our committee yet.

Mr. ALLISON. It has not been reported to the other House.

Mr. HAWLEY. It has not been reported to the House, so far as we are allowed to know the proceedings of the House, as I understand. It may be here some time or other.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator if this subject-matter has not been under discussion by the Committee on Military Affairs for a number of months?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, especially the committee of which my friend from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is the chairman. It has been discussed there over and over again, and moreover it is the same thing that the Senate in the last Congress passed without perhaps a single dissenting vote, practically unanimously. I refer to the pair of bills that provided 10,000 tons for Army guns and 10,000 tons for Navy guns. Over and over the question has been discussed, and yet the Senator from Kentucky rises and says, "We have no sort of means of knowing that this is the best way." You have been shown truly that half a dozen boards have investigated the subject, have reported exactly this, and that it has passed the Senate unanimously heretofore.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr CHANDLER. He has stated the number of guns the $5,000,000 will furnish. Does he mean the metal or the guns?

Mr. HAWLEY. The $5,000,000 will provide pieces enough for about two hundred and seventy guns.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will furnish them for fabrication?

Mr. HAWLEY. Furnish them for fabrication. The Senator uses that term to cover the finishing and assembling. I do not quite like it, because "fabrication" implies the whole work. The forging of the rough parts is what is covered by this clause. The "fabrication" is the word the Department uses in describing the business of fine finishing and assembling. That is not covered by this item.

Mr. PLUMB. Two years ago, when this question came up in the Senate as a matter of appropriation, I was very much in favor of some such plan as is covered by the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. Nothing was done because of a disagreement between the Senate and the House of Representatives as to what should be done, and nothing has been since done except what has been done for the Navy. I was quite willing myself that the amendment should be inserted in the bill providing an appropriation of $600,000 for manufacture, purchase, and test of cannon, etc.; but I am not as enthusiastic as I was two years ago about this project of the Senator from Connecticut. It is not actually certain that it will be a success. I know at all events that other governments are undertaking experiments in different directions, and that certain things have been developed which seem to show that the steel built-up gun is likely to be faulty as compared with others. I have here a dispatch, dated Vienna, May 29, as follows:

VIENNA, May 29.

The Austrian Government has adopted the automatic Maxim gun, which is considered the finest in existence. Thirty of these guns have been ordered to be delivered immediately to fortify Cracow and Przemyse.

Mr. HAWLEY. Before the Senator passes from that will he allow me to make a remark?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. The automatic Maxim gun carries an ounce ball.

Mr. PLUMB. It is an entirely new gun.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is a little rapid-firing gun. When a cartridge is fired it has rebound enough to set the machinery in motion by which the shell is thrown off and a new cartridge put in. You load, pull the trigger once, and go to your dinner, and by the time you get back it has fired a lot of cartridges of 1-ounce musket-balls.

Mr. PLUMB. With due respect to the Senator, I say I do not believe that he knows what he is talking about.

Mr. HAWLEY. We do not decide much by bets in the Senate, but I could appeal to two ordnance officers in the corridor and appeal to the intelligence of all the armies in the world.

Mr. PLUMB. That is very safe, because we can not appeal to the Supreme Court so as to have any effect on the passage of this bill; but this gun is thought worthy of being provided for the purpose of fortifying certain important points in Austria, and therefore I do not believe that the Senator understands it.

Mr. HAWLEY. But there has been one in the town within four weeks, in the War Department.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator is so loaded generally with ammunition and ordnance that he carries it about his person. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Thank you for the compliment, implying that I know something about the subject.

Mr. PLUMB. That I doubt. [Laughter.] Mr. President, the Senator pressed this measure on us with great momentum two years ago; but I think he is somewhat oblivious now to what has occurred within the last fiscal year. I do not say this may not be a good thing to do, but I mean to say it does not seem to be so conclusively a good thing to do as it was two years ago.

In the first place, important discoveries have been made within the past few years, in fact in the past twelve months, which I think tend to show, and conclusively do show in fact, that we are not to make guns on the plans we now know; that is, the best gun has not been made yet, and it is not necessarily to be made as a built-up gun. Guns can be lighter, more adjustable, containing a great deal more tensile strength than any iron or steel. Recent discoveries show that the metal to do that can be produced at a nominal cost. Aluminum has an affinity for iron. Heretofore there has been a combination of such materials that aluminum could not be readily separated from, but it is now being used in connection with the manufacture of certain very important articles in a large city in this country in such a way as to produce practically a new metal, a metal composed of iron and aluminum in combination, and a metal having a greater strength than iron has, a metal which is finer, softer, more malleable, and of greater tensile strength than either iron or steel. It opens up a very wide field in regard to this very question of gun manufacture. It is probably practicable to make by casting a gun of iron and aluminum which will have greater tensile strength than has heretofore existed in built-up steel guns.

I do not want to say anything disrespectful of the Ordnance Department of this Government; I have the highest personal respect for every one whom I know to be connected with it; and yet there is a remark in a letter, which I shall read in a moment, which expresses my idea, that those persons who are in charge of this Department are not sufficiently alive to the fact that somebody else may know something and that the whole world is marching on with great rapidity, developing new things, new ideas, new projects, and they are so conservative that even if what I have spoken of shall be definitely developed to be the fact they will not avail themselves of it in time to be of any use to this generation.

There has been recently tried what is called the pneumatic dynamite gun, and this bill contains an appropriation for the purchase of ten. Four hundred thousand dollars, it is thought, will furnish ten of these guns. I have some doubt as to the value of that gun, but I have a letter from a gentleman who, if I was permitted to disclose his name, would, I think, convey some idea of authority on this subject to the Senate. Referring to this gun, he says:

I consider it the complete solution of the harbor-defense question. Why do I? The gun uses a projectile that, in my opinion, nothing can withstand. Four hundred pounds of explosive gelatine is for destructive power entirely beyond any conception of the mind, and I do not overlook the cases where dynamite projectiles have not done what was expected.

The use of the pneumatic power allows of accuracy so that within the gun's range you can drop a projectile at any given point. Nets are no protection against it by reason of its line of flight, and they can not countermine and clear a channel, as in the case of fixed mines or torpedoes.

If you stop to think of the matter you will see that unless you propose to abandon torpedoes and mines for the defense of harbors (which would be exactly against the present tendency of things), then this gun is incomparably beyond anything heretofore known. It uses high explosives in larger quantities than any other weapon and in a way that vessels have at present no method of resisting. If I were Secretary of War I should have asked for $1,000,000 and should with that money have been able, I think, to protect perfectly every city in this country which has to be reached by a channel.

A million of dollars, according to the scale of prices established by this bill, would buy twenty-five of these guns, and according to the authority of this gentleman, no mean authority, who has watched every step of this experiment, and is himself in a responsible position, a million dollars would do more tenfold than the $5,000,000 that the Senator from Connecticut proposes to appropriate by his amendment. I have before me a letter from a gentleman in Philadelphia who writes to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in which, speaking of this general question, he says:

Would it not be better to await the full trial of the pneumatic gun now upon the cruiser recently launched by Messrs. Cramp? There are radically different opinions as to whether this gun—

That is the gun being arranged now upon the cruiser—will do all claimed for it, and until it is thoroughly tried nothing definite can be determined. I am not in the least interested in either gun.

He goes on to express the opinion that it is going to be a great success.

We have now entered upon this field of investigation. It has not been entered upon by persons employed by the Government; it has been entered upon by private people, by people under the stimulus of private enterprise, under the desire, of course, for profit, by people who survey the entire field, as unfortunately I think those who have charge of this matter for the Government do not. This gentleman goes on to say, concerning the pneumatic gun, that—

It is no longer experimental—

It has a range of about 2 miles, with the prospect that that range may be increased to 5 miles—and if ordnance officers were not a little impervious to the force of evidence—

That is the point I want to make—and if ordnance officers were not a little impervious to the force of evidence, we should have had the solution of the harbor-defense question settled by the general adoption of the gun.

There is, of course, wide room for difference of opinion about all these questions; but the Senator from Connecticut has observed that we have made great progress. Ten years ago it was said if you wanted a ship for offense or defense you must have one that was heavily armored. The concurrence of opinion on that subject was even stronger and more conclusive at the time than any concurrence is as to the character of the guns that the Senator from Connecticut now proposes the construction of. And yet to-day the whole civilized world admits that we do not want ships of that kind, because the power of offense has been developed far beyond the power of defense. You can not put upon the frame-work of any ship plate of sufficient thickness to resist the offensive weapons which in the mean time have been invented and put in use. In addition, that part of the ship which by modern inventions is exposed, to wit, the bottom, should never be plated at all. So the vessels which have been built by England, by France, by Italy, and by all foreign countries, with heavy armor, are not adapted for the present state of naval warfare. We shall never see one of these on the coast of this country. They are not to be feared.

Human invention has disposed of that question, and to-day the whole naval powers of the world, the United States included, are turning their attention to swift cruisers with a single large gun, and that have no solidity whatever practically so far as armor is concerned.

In the midst of this great revolution, why should we take up that which was proposed five or ten years ago and is confessedly not needed to-day? I venture now the prediction that if we enter upon this plan, within five years from now we shall be abandoning it. I do not mean to say that the appropriation will not do some good. I believe in keeping the officers of our Army employed; I believe in stimulating their genius and their efforts and their energy to enable us to keep as nearly as possible at a pace with or ahead of that which private enterprise is doing; but I do not want to rest on the theory that we are going to get the highest possible method of harbor defense or coast defense, because I believe the genius of individuals outside of the Army has contributed a method of solution which the Army has yet to take hold of or to appreciate.

We spend millions now. We have half a million in this bill for one item. They do not say they want anything else. They say they want to make a gun and test it, and after testing it to determine whether it is one that the Government should build or not. And yet the Senator from Connecticut wants to spend $5,000,000 upon the theory that we want that which no experiment has yet determined that we do want; and that, as I said before, although we are apprised of the very important fact that we have got, not at the expense of the Government, but at the expense of private parties solely, a weapon which to-day is superior to anything that ever has been manufactured. One shot from the pneumatic dynamite gun such as was fired from it last summer on the Hudson River will do more damage than a thousand shots fired from the best built-up gun. In the first place the range is more accurate than that of any gun can be the expelling power of which is powder.

In the next place, as stated in this letter, the shell it carries contains an amount of explosive the result of which is beyond the reach of contemplation almost of anybody as to its effect.

But I venture to say what will be the final result. I do not say the pneumatic dynamite gun is the best of its kind. On the contrary, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] spoke yesterday with that pride with which he always speaks of those things that concern his State of a patent for thirty-three inventions not only for the creation, but for the handling and the throwing of an explosive of the same character out of an ordinary gun with ordinary dry powder. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] says that is done in other countries. Whether he means thereby to disparage the inventive genius of the gentleman referred to by the Senator from Alabama I do not know. If it is done in other countries, then we have overlooked still another field in competition with these built-up steel guns and have developed another weapon which is superior to that, because it can be shown that torpedoes to be carried in the air and in the water and containing immense projectile force could be fired with accuracy out of an ordinary gun.

We have developed something which is of infinitely more consequence even than the pneumatic dynamite gun. We have got guns; we have got powder; we have all that is necessary except the preparation of the explosive. I will venture to say, as I have said before, that before we shall get fairly under operation under the propositions of this amendment, if it shall be adopted, every man will see that we have outgrown it all, that it was a coat fit for a boy when he had come to the stature of a man.

We have gained immensely as we all see now by not having entered upon the construction of ironclads twenty years ago. The obstructive policy of the Democratic House of Representatives as it was then was wise, although they did not know it.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose we had an immediate war now, would we not need the guns?

Mr. PLUMB. Suppose the skies should fall, should we not catch some larks? Mr. President, the man, woman, or child does not live who will ever hear a hostile shot fired on the American continent. It is not simply the possession of a few guns that makes the American people free from any possibility of intervention by foreign powers. It may or may not be the creation of a few weeks or a few months, but the inventive genius of 60,000,000 people will develop ten thousand times the offensive and defensive appliances required, of which we now know nothing. No one of the ironclads of the Old World to-day, in the absence of the pneumatic dynamite gun or gun of any kind, could ever sail into New York Harbor.

I do not say that therefore we ought not to provide something which shall at least seem to be adequate means for the public defense. We ought to provide against the accidents of the situation; it is all that we absolutely need to provide against. We want something to inspire the feeling of safety. The man who travels out in the country with my friend from Nevada does not carry a pistol because he thinks he will need it, but he carries it just on the principle that a man carries one in the State of Texas; he knows if he does need it he will need it badly, not because he thinks there is going to be any organized force out there that will attack him, not because there is any lack of that administration of the law which furnishes personal safety, but because he prefers to be safe against all peradventure. That is the condition of the people of the United States to-day. It does not need to do anything else except simply to provide against the possible accidents of the situation.

It ought to give stimulus to the inventive genius of its own people. It ought to be willing to accept the good things that the people of the United States bring to it at their own expense. I admit also that it ought to keep going the force of young, active, and intelligent men it has in its ordnance service.

I will venture to say when the stress comes on this country, if it ever does, its reliance will not be upon the regular Army any more than it was in 1861. It is the nucleus, it is the housekeeping service, and that is all. It is a good thing to have, a good thing to maintain and to be well spoken of—I utter no word to its discredit—but when I speak of the defense of this country I am speaking of something that bursts the bounds of any possibility of accomplishment by an army of twenty-five thousand men. I know, as every one here knows, that it is not the genius of peace that provides for war. It is the genius of the time of trial which focuses the determination, the judgment, the genius of every man in the country in one direction, and that the defense of the country, which develops that which is needed for the occasion.

We shall build, I have no doubt, in some way a gun foundry, and there will be a whirring of wheels, and there will be a turning of shafts, and there will be the making of guns after a perfunctory fashion; yet alongside of that and ahead of it, far beyond it all the time, will be going the effort of men who do these things and similar things not for the salary but because they are led by high ambition, by cupidity, if you please, but yet by that spirit which carries the nation forward all the time and which makes the regular Army and its accompaniment also by comparison a lack. I do not plead for one as against the other. I say give both of them a chance. Give to the Ordnance Bureau this half million dollars in order that they may make these experiments. They may want to send over to England to buy one gun. Good as they are, conservative as they are, honest as they are, they want to build a gun to see whether that is the kind of gun we want. Meanwhile other persons have determined at their own expense certain things which are greater in their results than anything that has yet been found. We shall take up these things as we go along. We shall buy some things perhaps that we do not want, but all the time we shall be getting something better, and every day and every week and every year we shall be getting further and further away from that which the Senator from Connecticut three years ago, or five years ago perhaps, said then as his judgment and the judgment of the world was the best possible thing.

The world has grown in the last five years. The report of the Gun Foundry Board is here because we put it into imperishable print; but if it had not been printed we should not be referring to it to-day. It is because we stick to these printed pages which we printed some years ago that we do not see the things going on around us. If instead of printing it the report of that Gun Foundry Board had been burned up and had gone out of the recollection of men we should not be referring to it here to-day, and we should be taking up the current things that have been developed since, squaring our accounts by those, taking into account those things as the things to be done necessary for the protection of the country and not clinging to things that are past.

For these reasons I have not felt that now I could support this amendment. I have voted for the other amendment. I am willing to keep this machinery of ours greased and going on, but I do not want to give to it in the large way here proposed every single thing that pertains to the defense of this country. I do not want to do it because I do not believe it represents the best possible for to-day; I do not believe it represents the best possible for to-morrow, and for the days yet to come. At all events, whatever it may be, it is only a part of that which sixty million people are doing in this same direction.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, we have been waiting since 1867 for something that was to supersede anything that we had, and we have done nothing. I will imagine a case. About 1826 a man hears that there is a new-fangled steam machine that can make 15 miles an hour upon some rails laid on the surface—a new locomotive. He says, "I will not build one; I know there is a man who is getting up one of 20 miles an hour." He waits until 1835 and finds that there is a man who has got up one that will go 35 miles an hour. He waits until 1860, and finds out that there is somebody who can go 50 miles an hour. That man has got up to 1888 without building a single locomotive, and that man is the dear friend of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HAWLEY. He does not want us to go to building things because we can do something better in the future.

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all. I am willing to do to-day the things for to-day and to-morrow I want to do the things for to-morrow.

Mr. HAWLEY. One gun then will only defend one little corner of New York Harbor. Let us put to-day our harbors in a decent condition of defense and I will wait with him; but I appeal to the common sense of the Senator to say whether a 17-inch gun throwing a 1,200-pound shot is ever likely to be entirely superseded, or whether even a 6-inch gun that throws a 100-pound chilled-steel bolt 5 or 6 miles is likely to be superseded, or whether a Hotchkiss revolving cannon that throws a chilled-steel projectile as fast as you can fire a revolver is likely to be superseded. I would stand within 2 miles and a quarter of the Zalinski battery with a 13-inch tube 40 feet long, with half a dozen revolving Hotchkiss guns, and I would shatter him and his friends all to pieces and never be reached by his dynamite charge. Mr. Zalinski says himself he has not the slightest idea in the world this is ever to supersede the best rifled cannon.

My friend says let us wait for the better thing. He says these guns will be abandoned in five years. Now, let us see. I hold in my hand a statement of these guns. The world is going away from them, he says. Here are nine ships of the British navy with from 4 to 24 inches of steel armor on their sides waiting for the finishing of seventy-eight steel guns.

Was there ever a nation since the world began that had more interest in solving this great naval and military problem than Great Britain has, whose colonies are found in every quarter of the world, whose trade depends upon the rifled cannon that she has got to protect her commerce on the seas, who pays the most liberal and generous rewards to every new inventor, who hears him state his case at night and says, "I will be on hand in the morning to see it tried," as I have had done to me by the British Board of Admiralty? They have an interest if anybody has. They are finishing up the Howe with four 13.5-inch 67-ton guns, the Collingwood with four 12-inch 45-ton guns, the Camperdown with four 13.5-inch 67-ton guns and six 6-inch 5-ton guns; for the Anson four 13.5-inch 67-ton guns and six 6-inch 89-hundredweight guns, the Undaunted with two 9.2-inch 22-ton guns, the Australia with two 9.2-inch 22-ton guns and ten 6-inch 5-ton guns, the Narcissus with two 9.2-inch 22-ton guns and ten 6-inch 5-ton guns, the Galatea with two 9.2 inch 22-ton guns and ten 6-inch 5-ton guns, and the Immortalité with two 9.2-inch 22-ton guns and ten 6-inch 89-hundredweight guns.

Those vessels are lying at the wharf waiting to have those seventy-eight manufactured guns put on board—the very guns I have been describing here. That 9.2-inch gun has been well tried. One was tried last year on the occasion of the jubilee. Ordnance officers made up the elements of trial, the gun of such a size, such a bore, of such a length, the shot so long, of such a caliber, such chilled steel, so much powder of such a description, and sent these elements out to the ordnance officers of the world to calculate what would be the range of that gun at an elevation of 40 degrees. The young man who won the premium was an officer of our Army, a Mr. Ingalls—Captain Ingalls, I think; I may have forgotten his rank—whose estimate was nearest. The projectile went 20,000 yards, or within a few yards of eleven miles and a quarter, and yet I am told that a wooden tube carrying a big shell of 400 or 500 pounds of dynamite is to take the place of that gun. A single gun would go through the whole American Navy side by side. Except the old monitors, there are not thirty vessels fit to go to sea; you could lay them side by side, and it would go through them. Such guns are not about to be superseded anywhere.

The Senator reads a statement from an anonymous gentleman; he may be a shareholder in the Dynamite Gun Company or Aluminium Steel Company.

There are one or two other points. He says if the report of the Gun Foundry Board had not been printed we should not have remembered it. I think he is slightly mistaken. We did not need that record to tell what kind of guns the world wanted.

I have here another statement about English guns, giving the number issued for sea service. Four hundred and seventy-five breech-loading rifles were issued within seventeen years, and thirteen hundred and thirty-two muzzle-loading rifles, amounting to eighteen hundred and seven steel heavy rifle guns issued within seventeen years by the British Government.

I put that immense expenditure of the British Government against the anonymous letter of the gentleman who thinks he has got hold of something better than anything that has come yet. I hope he has. We get rumors and rumors of inventions. Some of them amount to something and some do not.

But the Senator says with a sort of eloquent felicity that the time of genius is the time of trial; the genius of the time of trial will develop that which is needed for the occasion. I assent to that in a measure. The genius of the time of trial developed the Monitor in the beginning of the war, but, sir, ten times over, while that Monitor was building, Great Britain or France or Spain could have collected $200,000,000 in the city of New York without the possibility of resistance on the part of New York. The Monitor was a brilliant idea, and my friend Rowland nearly killed himself by working night and day for one hundred days to finish it, until divine Providence sent that modern machine down to Hampton Roads in time, you might say, in a sense, to save the country.

I have a book here giving me some tables of the distances. Here is a figure or two. Before the gentleman could turn around, before he could plant mines in New York Harbor, before he could get himself ready, the British fleet would come from Halifax. What is Halifax? The strongest position they perhaps have in the world, a naval station, the largest dock, and supplied always with coal and with every naval supply in anticipation of any trouble with us. Some of these vessels, he says, will not sail. They do sail, nevertheless. They go over there and quietly rendezvous; the officers dance with the ladies at night until the telegraph informs them that they have to take Portland, and in from thirty to thirty-four hours they are at Portland. They have another great fleet at Bermuda to assist them. From Havana the Spanish fleet can reach New Orleans in forty-five hours; and ninety-six hours from Vancouver would place a British fleet in front of San Francisco.

That is the sort of war nowadays. War nowadays does not wait for three months. War flashes, and fires the next day. Cap-a-pie the continent of Europe stands, each nation glancing at the other, not knowing when the long roll will be beaten. While the gentleman is looking around upon a new invention the German army crosses the Rhine and is at Sedan, is soon in Paris; the Emperor is a prisoner, and France pays a thousand millions of ransom. That is the way war is declared nowadays.

The Senator says we shall never hear a hostile shot fired on this continent We shall never hear a hostile shot fired by the militiamen in the middle of our States. No foreign nation would make war in that way upon us. Nobody supposes that they would land an army and that we should step back from the shore and say, "Gentlemen, please come on shore." "One hundred thousand?" "Thank you." "One hundred and fifty thousand?" "Yes." "Three hundred thousand?" "Yes; walk on shore, gentlemen. Walk up in the country." Provided even as we are for that kind of war, we should give a good account of ourselves. We have only twenty-five little steel cannon, to be sure, and we have got a few old smooth-bores, but they would do. We could collect 20,000 men from the regular Army, and about 200,000 of the National Guard would turn out, and we have some spare rifles at Springfield, not enough for a large army, but pretty good, and we could extemporize an army, and by sheer force of multitude we would roll over that foreign force and swallow it, no matter if it cost five men of ours to one of theirs. But that is not war.

Great Britain has two hundred and seventy-five vessels which she can sail out to-day to make war. She has forty-one vessels drawing under 7 feet, which are armed with 10-inch guns and 67-pounders. They can go up the Welland Canal into Lake Erie.

Gentlemen say these things will never happen. I suppose to the superficial observer there never was a fairer scene than hung over this continent in 1860; and yet it was not a year before men by the hundred thousand were shaking the continent with their tread, and we were losing twenty thousand and thirty thousand in battles. No war! Who can prophesy? The pull of the trigger, the touch of the electric signal may plunge us into war. Are we sure of it?

I dare you to invite combat with any foreign nation. There is not a Congress, one so idiotic could not be assembled in these Halls, as to declare war against any, even a fourth-rate power, for any imaginable insult. You dare not do it. They have you at their mercy. They can treat you to two hundred and fifty ironclads and vessels of all sorts and descriptions, with thousands of modern guns, and show you their rendezvous at twenty places in the West Indies, along the shore, and their rendezvous within gunshot of you on the Pacific at Victoria or Vancouver.

No, sir, this is where we are. We, under any imaginable provocation, must negotiate, and procrastinate, and exercise the arts of diplomacy and politeness. We can endure outrages, we can go on so undoubtedly for a great while, and we can escape war; but by and by somebody will make such a demand on us for something to be done or yielded that for very shame, even if we had not a pocket-knife, the American people will say, "Never," and then come your millions of ransom from your different cities, your scanty commerce driven from the ocean, your people humiliated with a shame that will make them weep for centuries. Then you will have guns built, and you will have ships built, and you will uplift your hands, and you will swear for revenge if it takes ten years to get it; but the brand will be on you forever, and then the men who told us generation by generation not to arm ourselves will hide themselves lest the mountains should fall upon them when that day comes.

These things you are liable to. I am drawing no extreme picture. I say we have here before you what your War Department, what your Navy Department, what the war and navy departments of every nation in the world say is the best thing to be done now. I am aware that the appropriation bill comes here within two days of the close of the fiscal year, and we are begged not to embarrass that bill. I shall not hear to it. I rebel, I say. We are told that we might wait for a fortification appropriation bill. That is not here; it is not even reported. We have tried that. We put this very proposition upon the fortifications bill last year and it led to a defeat of the bill. We passed bills independently, and they went to the House of Representatives and they have slept the sleep of death. Will gentlemen tell us what course to take? Is there anything they will do?

I told how the Republican party, when the Democrats came into power, threw their hands up and said, "Now we will do something; you go on and we will vote everything you want." They are doing nothing. Not one stroke of a spade in thirteen years for our coast defenses, not one dollar for two or three years for their preservation, not an ounce of mortar to bind the falling revetments, not a pound of paint to paint the cannon, not money enough to pay for timber to shore up your tumbling casemates. You have abandoned them. They are falling.

This is the truth, the absolute truth, exactly as it stands. I am out of patience, I know. I think I have a right to be. Go abroad and hear the comments of men skilled in the art of defense and of warfare upon our condition. Was there ever such a happy-go-lucky reliance upon luck as ours since the world began? Sixty-three million people, worth about $50,000,000,000, lying helplessly, a dismasted hulk or a lazy whale at sea, a monstrous mass of potential power, but against the modern steel gun no more effective than a dead whale.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Connecticut was somewhat swift in impugning the motives of the gentleman whose letter I read. He said, after, I have no doubt, ample reflection, that he was probably a stockholder in some pneumatic-gun company.

Mr. HAWLEY. I said possibly, because the Senator did not disclose his name.

Mr. PLUMB. I will relieve the Senator on that point. He is not only not a stockholder in that company but he is not interested in any steel works. He is a gentleman who has more responsibility to-day about the matter of coast defenses than all the Senators of the United States put together.

I beg the Senator to understand that the General of the Army himself is on record in the most emphatic way, stronger than the letter which I read, in favor of this new appliance, so that it has got out of the domain of private speculation. I hope when the Senator from Connecticut comes to impute motives he will be tolerably sure of his ground.

But I beg to say another thing. I do not care so much about European opinion. They may think we are happy-go-lucky. If we had guided ourselves by European opinion we would not have had any republic at all. When the Senator comes to me with the opinion of Europe in regard to American institutions, in regard to American works of offense and defense, I tell him that that opinion is inspired with the deepest possible hatred of the American people; it is not a judgment worth quoting at all.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not catch what opinion the Senator referred to.

Mr. PLUMB. I am speaking of European opinion upon anything affecting the American Republic. If the Senator does not feel like hearing that adverse opinion I think he had better stay at home.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator must know I spoke of European opinion upon guns that would best defend them.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand, and that is born not of a knowledge of the situation, but is born, as I said, of dislike and deep distrust and hatred of the American people. So far as I am concerned I do not propose that that shall have any influence with me. This is a question not to be settled by the opinion, haphazard or otherwise, of those persons who would not participate in maintaining the American Republic, but in depreciating it and breaking it down.

I have no doubt they would like to have us get into their ways. They would like to have us buy or build some of their useless ironclads. Great Britain has been building ironclads for a number of years, just as men have built houses, and other men have come along with better ones, and they have not abandoned them for that reason.

To-day the British ironclad is practically useless. It has not been two years since one of the heaviest ironclads sank on its first trial trip without a gun being fired against her.

The British people have not won by dexterity, by skill; they have won by bull-dog resolution. They have piled their dead, and they have had to walk over their dead bodies rather than adapt themselves to modern conditions. The British Government is not a government to go to for reference in regard to warfare, except when it comes to a question of personal courage and persistency. That they have enough of. Take the experience of the British and French combined in the Crimean war, where the British starved to death in their own tents for lack of food and other supplies, and had to be clothed and sheltered and fed from the French commissary.

It is not to Great Britain that we are to go for lessons on this subject. She is not a first-class power in that sense of power that fills the breast. We have had ample illustrations in the last few years that underneath all the admiralty and all the army establishments Great Britain is a honeycombed superstructure of fraud. There has not been a contract let probably in the British navy and in the British army in the last ten years that has not been the result of favoritism. Of course they would build great ironclads they did not want, for thereby they gave fraudulent profits to favorite contractors. We get nothing by comparison in that quarter. The Senator from Connecticut has weakened, in my judgment, his argument entirely by the comparison he has made with Great Britain.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think the fact that frauds have been committed in the British navy is a reason why we should not have any guns. I think that if you will examine the question you will find that they have better guns than we have, notwithstanding all the frauds. I believe that is the evidence of all our officers and of every man who has visited them, and that every nation of any importance on the earth is better prepared for defense and for attack than we are. We are so helpless that we dare not protest in a manly way against any third-rate power for any outrage it may commit.

Look at the Samoan Islands. The people of my section of the country went out there, they really built up the government, they were trading there. A German fleet came in and took possession, and claimed the islands, and we dared not to protest in any manly way. If we had been armed properly and put in an ordinary protest, they would not have taken possession against our ships. We dared not complain of it. How humiliating that is.

So it goes on all around. We can not meet Great Britain on equal terms. I was in Victoria last summer. They are building a large establishment there, and fortifying. They have an immense naval establishment there. What can we do? Nothing. We are so everywhere.

When you undertake to say that there never will be a gun fired again on this continent, it seems to me that you are not regarding the example of all those around us. We are a great big fat goose to be plucked by anybody, and as long as we remain in that condition we are liable to be plucked. We may be able to buy our peace for a time, but every time we surrender our rights and refuse to defend them we grow weaker, and foreign powers will presume further and further because we can not resent an outrage.

The idea has been advanced that we should not be at work building guns because we may not build as good ones as will be manufactured some years from now, because they will be improved. We are asked to wait until the work is perfected, and while we wait we are in the condition I have stated. What we want is to be at all times ready to defend the honor of our flag, to defend our rights, to demand respect. We want to be in that condition, and the only way we can be in it is to be building defenses and preparing for defense all the time.

I had the honor more than twenty years ago to offer a resolution in the Senate instructing the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire into the expediency of building two ships a year, one to be built by the Navy Department and the other by contract, and to abandon repairing old hulks. The measure seemed to be popular. It passed the Senate after a short debate, and it seemed to meet the approbation of everybody. It was afterwards abandoned, and we have not built any; we have not kept up the necessary establishments. We have spent as much money on those hulks as would have been necessary to have carried out that plan. If that had been done we should have had some first-class ships; we should have had some first-class mechanics. But until you build ships, until you allow establishments to be created in this country, you will not have mechanics, you will not have the appliances, and you will have to bear any indignity that any nation has a mind to inflict upon you while you are preparing.

It seems to me that we need mechanics, we need establishments, and we should be prepared to get ready. We need to be ready to prepare for war. Of course we do not propose to prepare for war, but we want a nucleus. If we want guns we should have establishments where they can be manufactured. This takes years, and although we may not make the best guns at first, we should have a place where we could make them, and during all the time we should be doing this we should be receiving the reward of protection, we should be insured against trouble, we should be demanding and preserving peace.

It seems to me that to allow a great nation like this to be in the peril it now is, to be at the caprice of all the world, is criminal. It is criminal, I say, in those having the power to put us in an attitude of defense, to allow this great nation to stand here the prey of any nation which may be wicked enough to make war upon us.

I remember the consternation in San Francisco when there was talk about trouble with Chili. She could have come up here with her ironclads and levied contributions. Everybody was alarmed, and everybody lost faith in the Government. Chili, that little power, had two or three guns and could go there and levy contributions upon San Francisco and all your cities along the lakes and seaboard.

We should be at all times prepared to build guns and to defend ourselves. Foreign nations know exactly how we are situated, and they know we would pay tribute rather than subject this country to the damage which might be inflicted. They know we let them have the Samoan Islands, and they know that we shall make the treaty they want with Great Britain in regard to the northern boundary. There are 4,000 miles of crooked boundary between us and Canada. Difficulties are liable to arise over it, and we must be in a position to deal with Great Britain on equal terms, because I tell you Great Britain is aggressive. She is polite to power, she always bows to power, but she takes what she can without resistance, no matter where it is.

She goes just as far as she can. If there is nothing in the way she will take up any country. She has never been bound by any law but the law of power. She has conquered the world wherever she could, and she has taken all the advantages that she was able to take. She will do so with us.

We are discussing the treaty and we are in a position where we can criticise the Administration for having made it, but I doubt whether anybody could have made a better treaty. We are afraid to demand a better one. We could have got a better one if we had had a nucleus of an army. If we had had guns, if we had had machine-shops, if we had had a navy, Great Britain would never have thought of asking of us what she was not willing to grant to us. She would not give us the same privileges in her harbors and in her ports that we grant to her.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask the Senator what was the inducement of Great Britain to give us $15,000,000 as the result of the Geneva award?

Mr. STEWART. It was because we then had the best navy in the world; because when our iron-clads went over there there was commotion in Great Britain. They had not built their navy. We had the best navy in the world then, and the English knew that it would be unsafe for them to offend us, for their navy then was in a very defenseless condition. But if times should change, if things had been then as they are to-day, they would have laughed at us. The $15,000,000 was paid because we had the best navy.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it was because we had demonstrated the power of a free people to maintain their integrity by arms to an extent that was sufficiently demonstrative.

Mr. STEWART. All the world then was without a navy. They have gone on since and built a navy. The English press said at the time that the reason why they negotiated it was because we were prepared to defend ourselves, because we had a superior navy, and the English nation complained that they were negotiating with us not on equal terms; that we were prepared for war and they were not. Now they have changed. They have been building ships and guns, and we have not. The times have changed. We could not make any such treaty as that now.

Let us build a navy, not a large one, but an effective one. Let us have machine-shops where we can manufacture guns. Let us have the nucleus of defense, so that we shall be on equal terms, and then we can make treaties with Great Britain as we did before. We are proud of that treaty because it was a concession, but it was a concession not only to the great power of the American people, but it was a concession to the ironclads, and it was placed distinctly upon that ground by the British press.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FRYE. One moment, if the Senator will allow me. I yielded day before yesterday an hour to the Senator from Iowa in order that the Army appropriation bill might be passed in season to become operative on the 1st of July, and I at the same time informed the Senate that honor compelled me to be absent the first three days of next week. It seems to me that this bill can be disposed of in a very short time in the morning. If not, I desire to take up the river and harbor bill, which is in my charge. I should like to have the Senate adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. There is no reason why we should not do so. We have been doing nothing for the last two or three weeks, and we might just as well work now as to play.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was the Chicago convention nothing?

Mr. FRYE. It was nothing to us here. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I will move that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask for a division.

LOAN OF TENTS, ETC.

Mr. HAWLEY. I fear that a division may disclose the lack of a quorum. There is a little matter that ought to be disposed of if Senators will let me call their attention to it. I ask unanimous consent to call attention to House joint resolution 188.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Connecticut proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAWLEY. We passed a joint resolution that came from the House in regard to loaning tents, etc., at Gettysburgh, supposing it to be just what was wanted. The War Department criticises it, and the House passed it over again, correcting a single word. The words were "tents and tent equipage." They meant "camp equipage." Nobody noticed it. The House sent over to us this afternoon a corrected joint resolution reading "tents and camp equipage." I ask the Senate to concur with the House in the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to consider the joint resolution (H. Res. 188) authorizing the loan of tents and camp equipage to the veteran organizations of the Society of the Army of the Potomac. The joint resolution will be read the second time at length if there be no objection.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length and considered as in Committee of the Whole

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not intend to interpose any objection to the consideration of this resolution, but I am opposed to its passage. It is in direct conflict with the precedents of the Military Committee in all other cases, and will entail a heavy expense on the Government. I am willing, however, that this experiment shall be made, but I want to enter my disapproval of the action, so that I shall be on the record in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Having been read three times, the question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

The joint resolution was passed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. FRYE. I now renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Maine, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 29, noes not counted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 187) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I move to take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening. ["No!" "No!"] I understood Senators desire to pass this bill to-night.

Mr. HAWLEY. We can not get a quorum here this evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I hope we shall go on with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I was very much amazed at the frenzy into which my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and the venerable Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] wrought themselves. I could almost imagine that I could see the British red-coats coming down from the sky and landing on American soil and driving back the timid Yankees, sacking their cities, levying contributions upon them, and humiliating American citizens.

Mr. HAWLEY. They burned this Capitol once.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, they burned this Capitol once, and they regretted it, and regret it to this day.

Mr. HAWLEY. So do we.

Mr. STEWART. Do not we regret it?

Mr. COCKRELL. We do not regret it. I do not regret it; the American people do not regret it. When a nation can descend to such a depth the American people will not regret it.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada said that we must place ourselves upon an equality with England. I suppose that is the object of this. In other words, the United States of America must have a standing army equal to England and must have a navy equal to England. The United States must have a standing army equal to Germany, a standing army equal to France, and a navy equal to that of France or Germany.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator is mistaken as to what I said. I did not say that. I did not speak about a standing army.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator used the words "equal footing."

Mr. STEWART. That we were to be on a footing with other nations in building guns. Without the guns we are at their mercy.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator used deliberately the words "equal footing."

Mr. STEWART. I say "equal footing." I want to be on an equal footing with all the world.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then you want a standing army like Great Britain; you want a standing army like France; a standing army like Germany.

Why, Mr. President, to hear these distinguished Senators speak you would think that the American people were standing trembling in their boots, as the saying is, in trepidation and fear. Thank God, that is not the feeling of the American people. The bone and sinew of the United States fear no people, nor the combined nations of the earth. We can bid defiance to England, to France, to Germany, to Russia, to all the nations combined. You could not hire one of these nations to attack the United States. Not one of them would dare to do it. A million dollars of gold poured into the treasury of any nation on earth would not induce that nation to enter the port of New York and levy a contribution upon that city.

Mr. STEWART. Do you approve of Germany taking the Samoan Islands?

Mr. COCKRELL. That has nothing to do with the Senate of the United States. What good would all the fortifications on earth here do in protecting the Samoan Islands?

Mr. STEWART. Do you approve of that?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not discussing that question. What have the Samoan Islands to do with the defense of the territory of the United States? Nothing more than a Chinaman has to do with it.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Missouri answer my question? Does he approve of it?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is none of your business whether I do or not.

Mr. STEWART. That is evidence——

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not a question in issue. The Senator can not take me from his position for a standing army equal to England. That is the theory of the distinguished Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I never suggested anything of the kind.

Mr. COCKRELL. "On an equal footing" was the Senator's language.

Mr. STEWART. Yes, I said that.

Mr. COCKRELL. On an equal footing, and an equal footing would be an equal number of soldiers, an equal number of ships and fortifications all around your coast, equal to those of England. The United States needs no fortifications.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question? Does he admit that we are not on an equal footing now with Great Britain?

Mr. COCKRELL. We are far superior to Great Britain.

Mr. STEWART. Far superior?

Mr. COCKRELL. Far superior to Great Britain.

Mr. STEWART. In guns?

Mr. COCKRELL. We can demand of Great Britain whatever is just and right, and Great Britain or any other nation on earth will yield to our just demands. The point is that the American people fear nobody. They worship at the shrine of an Everlasting Almighty Jehovah and not at the shrine of any kingly power or all the kingly powers of earth combined. We bid them defiance. Under a Democratic Administration, if the Senator pleases, we are not bowing to any nation; we are not asking that millions be expended in building forts along our borders and along the coast. We need no defense but the brave, true, patriot hearts of sixty millions of American citizens, and they are equal to any emergency that can be cast upon this people. Not a nation on earth could to-morrow declare war against the United States and come and attack any city of any consequence in the United States—not one; and no two of them could do it.

It is ridiculous to talk about any nation coming here and attacking the United States; it is childish. There is no danger. The Senator from Nevada need have no fear. He will never see a foreign nation levying a contribution upon San Francisco; he will never see a foreign nation levying a contribution upon New York; he will never see a foreign nation levying a contribution upon Charleston, Mobile, Galveston, or any other city in the United States. We need have no fears from the outside world.

We have on our southern border our sister Republic of Mexico. We are too brave, too magnanimous, too generous, too chivalrous to attack our weaker sister republic. There is no danger from her. We have on our northern frontier Canada. What would Canada do? The militia of the border States could go over there and take care of Canada, and do it in a very short time. We do not want any forts along the Canadian border to keep the Canadians from coming over into the United States. No, no, you could not get the Canadians to come over in hostile array across the Canadian line. Why? They know that in thirty or sixty days from that time we should possess every single foot of their territory, have them under our power and jurisdiction, and do with them just as we pleased. There would not be a skirmish even.

Now, how can any nation attack us? Do you suppose that Great Britain could be hired or could be induced to enter into any combination to come here and attempt to levy a contribution upon the city of New York? No, sir, the English statesmen can never be induced to commit so suicidal an act as that. Were Great Britain to do it, it would be the death-knell of her power, and her statesmen know it; it would be the decline upon which she would rapidly descend as a great power in this world. Why, Mr. President, in a very short time American ingenuity, American resources, American courage and devotion to this Union and to our Constitution, would make a navy, would make a fleet that would drive England from the ocean and humiliate her and make her pay $10,000 for every dollar of contribution that she might attempt to levy upon an American city.

No, Mr. President, we want none of these things to try to intimidate the nations of the earth. The United States does right; the United States will continue to do right, and it will ask nothing but what is right, and asking what is right, it will obtain it from any nation on earth; and we need no standing army, we need no clustering fortifications around our coast to make the nations of the earth do us justice. They will do it without them, and there is not one American citizen in ten thousand who has any apprehension, any fear, any disturbance as to what the nations of the earth may do. We do not care what they do. We can take care of ourselves. We want no unholy alliances; we want no combinations with any nation. We take no nation as an exemplar. We, when our fathers landed on this soil, ordained an entirely new system of government, a system which had never been seen on earth before. It is a system which has never yet been adopted elsewhere. Under it we have grown to be what we are, and under it for all time to come we shall continue to grow and to prosper, and we shall have no alliances with other countries. We do not need their help.

Talk about Great Britain not being willing to do justice to the United States! Why, Mr. President, it is in the memory of some living to-day that we had a fearful fratricidal war when section was arrayed against section, and American soldier met American soldier upon many a battle-field, and the tempest of war came. After that peace spread all over this land and the Stars and Stripes waved in honor and glory from one end of the land to the other, and every knee bowed and every tongue confessed its peaceful sway; one-half of the country was paralyzed and comparatively devastated financially, and yet the Government of the United States demanded of Great Britain compensation for her sympathy and her sympathetic acts with the rebellion and got more than the equivalent of all the losses. We got more than we were entitled to according to our own theory, and we quarreled here in the Senate and in the other House of Congress over three years in finding somebody to whom to give the money.

Now that every cause of dissension and sectional jealousy and spite has been removed, and we have an indissoluble Union of indestructible States; now that we are one people in all our hopes and aspirations, to talk about any nation coming to our shores and making a demand for contributions is ridiculous. As I said before, you could not hire Great Britain to commit such a suicidal act.

Mr. President, we need no fortifications on our coast, we need no standing army. We simply need in this country a little, compact military organization merely as a nucleus. We need a militia far more than we need any army. We need a navy more than we need fortifications, far more than we need fortifications. We do not need the fortifications. Build your fortifications to-day, and a year hence the system of fortifications will be so improved that your fortifications, artillery, and officers will be useless. You do not know what kind of fortifications you want. You do not want mortar; you do not want stone; you do not want brick; you do not want wood. What do you want? What is the best? One says one thing and another another. We do not know yet what is best.

There is no occasion for experimenting. We shall have no war. This nation will give no other nation cause of war, and no nation will commit any act of war against us.

So there is no danger. The time may come when we may want a few fortifications, but it will only be when we have determined what kind of fortifications will stand and resist the ordnance which may be conceived by the ingenuity of the American people. It may be in time that we shall only need steel casemates and breastworks. We can not tell.

Mr. President, I am sorry that the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, the gallant and faithful soldier of the war, should have suffered himself to become—I scarcely know what to say—to become so wrought up over the danger of this country getting into a war with some foreign nation and being humiliated. The people of the country do not share any such idea.

Then the Senator from Nevada wanted to place the United States on an equal footing with England. Mr. President, I am sorry that the Senator from Nevada wanted to humiliate the United States. He would bring the United States down to an equal footing with Great Britain, when we occupy a pedestal far above her or any other kingly or monarchical power. I do not like to be placed down on that kind of deposit, and I see no occasion whatever for this excitement about the possibility of the United States being attacked and contributions being levied upon our cities and the people of the United States humiliated. There is no danger, not one particle, and the Senator from Nevada may sleep in the consciousness of perfect freedom from any harm now and henceforth.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, in view of the great importance of this measure, and the slim attendance in the Senate, I move an adjournment.

Mr. STEWART. Please let me have a minute and a half before you move an adjournment,

Mr. FAULKNER. If we could have a vote I would withdraw the motion, but a vote can not now be had.

Mr. STEWART. I only want to make a few remarks.

Mr. FAULKNER. How long does the Senator propose to speak?

Mr. STEWART. Five minutes.

Mr. FAULKNER. Then I withdraw the motion, to allow the Senator five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the motion is withdrawn it must be withdrawn unconditionally. Does the Senator withdraw his motion?

Mr. STEWART. He did withdraw it. I understood him to do so.

If boasting would scare Great Britain, I think if we had four or five men like the Senator from Missouri there would not be any necessity for any armament whatever; but it has not happened to turn out that way in the past.

Another thing. The Senator from Missouri is so far inland that he probably would be safe at the present time. I think he would. I think a foreign enemy would not get in as far as where he lives. He is entirely safe, because he is not on the seaboard. But I remember something in history with regard to the conduct of Great Britain. It has been already suggested that at one time she burned our Capitol, and she could do it again. She could take New York. We have no guns; as has been stated all around, we have not one gun to repel the attack of any first-class power. This is not a question of a standing army. It is a question whether we shall build a few guns, a question of whether we shall have any guns at all.

The Senator from Missouri does not care about a 20-inch gun; that is not anything to him. He could march right up to it and blow it the other way probably. But the experience of all nations that have dealt with Great Britain has taught them the necessity of having guns to meet her guns.

The Senator says Great Britain will not interfere with us. I remember when the destinies of this nation trembled in the balance and when Great Britain threatened to send her fleets here, at the time of the Mason and Slidell incident, when every Union soldier and every Union man and woman in the whole country was trembling lest that event should come. If it had occurred, what would have been the result? I remember that distinctly, and I remember hearing all my neighbors say that if we ever were in a position to act Great Britain should never make such a demand again. We submitted then to any demand she might make.

That is not all. This brave Administration is allowing things to proceed, and they are excused on the ground that we can not help it. I have alluded to the taking of the Samoan Islands. The Senator from Missouri would not say whether he approved that or not. I do not believe any American citizen approves of those islands being taken from us after we had populated them, as it were, and they were ours. We had no fleet to send there, and a large German fleet came and took possession.

I believe that the principal argument in favor of the fisheries treaty is that we dare not ask for anything better. The tone of the argument of those who favor it in the Senate is this: "Dare you say to Great Britain that you will make no treaty? Dare you let this go on without a treaty? If you demand more of Great Britain she will chastise you." We are making that treaty, I say, under duress. What was it that made us successful in obtaining what we demanded of Great Britain at the close of our war, when our ironclads were superior to hers?

It costs but little to be in a state of preparation. We do not want any standing army to be on an equal footing with other nations, but we do need guns. Men can not fight battles with their hands. We need machine-shops so that we can provide guns in case of emergency; we need preparation; we need to keep pace with the times, so that we may prepare for war before we are destroyed or before we submit to humiliating treaties. I do not believe any American citizen would agree to the fisheries treaty except on the ground that we are unable to demand better of Great Britain. Why is Great Britain fortifying on the Pacific and having a large naval establishment there? Why is she spending millions and millions on the naval establishment on the Pacific? She will command that coast. Why does she do that? It can be pointed to nobody but us. Why is she building a canal so that she will have a water way to carry her naval ships to the lakes? Why is she making preparation, as I say, in case of emergency? Why are her guns pointed toward us, if she is entirely pacific? When she is doing these things, why should we not build guns or put ourselves in preparation to build them? I say that it is criminal to leave this great Republic in as defenseless a condition as it is, and I deny that the Senator from Missouri can halloo loud enough and get excited enough to scare Great Britain or beat her ironclads in case of war.

But I will not detain the Senate longer.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will say to Senators that——

Several SENATORS. "Vote!" "Vote!"

Mr. FAULKNER. If I was satisfied that we could have a vote, I would not insist on the motion; but I am sure there is not a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia that the Senate do now adjourn. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. ALLISON. As there is not a quorum, and one can not be had without a call, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 30, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move to dispense with the consideration of private business for this day, with a view to going on with the tariff bill.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas to yield to me to make a privileged report.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the House adopt my motion to dispense with private business first and I will yield to the gentleman.

The question being taken on the motion to dispense with private business, there were—ayes 40, noes 13.

So the motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I yield now to the gentleman from Georgia to submit a privileged report.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I am directed by the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to submit the following report:

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8989) making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

JUDSON C. CLEMENTS,
FELIX CAMPBELL,
LOUIS E. McCOMAS,
Managers on the part of the House.
P. B. PLUMB,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I desire to submit a few remarks in connection with this report and in explanation of it. I wish to state particularly the main points upon which the conferees of the Senate and the House have been unable to agree.

First, I would call attention to the fact that the bill as proposed by the House carries an aggregate appropriation in round numbers of $4,525,000. As proposed to be amended by the Senate the total aggregate will be in the neighborhood of $5,381,000. The appropriation for the last fiscal year for this purpose amounted to $4,284,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is an increase, then, of over a million of dollars.

Mr. CLEMENTS. If the Senate amendments should be concurred in by the House, the increase would be something over a million of dollars over the law for the current fiscal year and $855,628 over the bill for 1889 as passed by the House.

The principal points upon which we have been unable to agree, on account of the large increase proposed by the Senate, are, first, upon the amount appropriated for paving and improving the streets of the city. The amount fixed by the Senate is $757,000, in round numbers, for this purpose, which does not include permit work, repairs, cleaning and sweeping the streets, and ordinary repairs of that sort.

Upon the subject of schools we could substantially agree if the other questions were out of the way. Still it is proper I should state the increase proposed for that purpose. For new school-houses it is proposed by the House bill to appropriate $235,000 as against $230,000 last year. It is proposed by the Senate to increase that amount to $397,000. For public schools, including new school buildings, the amount proposed by the House is $842,000 as against $812,000 last year. The Senate proposes $1,036,000. All I desire to do in this statement is simply to call attention to these totals. I will ask the permission of the House to insert in the RECORD a comparison of the District appropriations from 1881 to the present time, which covers the period during which the District has been provided for by a separate bill. Prior to that time the appropriations were made on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Right at that point, will the gentleman from Georgia pardon me for asking whether this difference of about $160,000 in the appropriation is for schools alone, or does it cover school-houses—school buildings?

Mr. CLEMENTS. The difference is $194,041. I read two statements, one in relation to school buildings and one for the support of schools. The principal difference grows out of an increase in the number of school-houses that is proposed by the Senate. But, as I stated, while we feel the Senate amendments go too far and are too great an increase for one year, out of proportion to increases heretofore, in our judgment, necessary to the proper care of children of school age, having in view the enrollment of last year, still we could agree on this subject if we could agree on other amendments.

There is another difference between us, and that is in relation to the control of the contingent fund appropriated by this bill. Under the present law all of the heads of Departments of the Government have their contingent funds expended under the supervision and final control of the First Comptroller of the Treasury. For the last three or four years the contingent fund of the District has been under the sole control of the commissioners, and not subject to the review of the Comptroller. We think this is a bad practice, and see no reason why the Secretary of the Treasury and the heads of all other Departments should have their contingent expenditures overlooked by the First Comptroller and yet that the commissioners of the District of Columbia should be excepted from that supervision.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him whether the commissioners of the District object to that supervision?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I must say that the civil commissioners have protested against it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that point will not be yielded.

Mr. RANDALL. That point ought never to be yielded.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Another point of disagreement is as to the question of putting telephone, telegraph, and electric lighting wires underground in this city. We have been asked for several years past, and have appropriated and are asked to appropriate in this bill, an increased amount for putting the District wires under-ground. We have inserted a proviso that where that is done the wires of companies for these various purposes shall be required to go under-ground also on the same streets under the direction of the commissioners.

The Senate proposes to strike that out. We also, with the unanimous voice of this House, included in the bill a proviso, that any surplus remaining at the end of the fiscal year might in the discretion of the sinking-fund commissioner be applied to the extinguishment of the debt of the District owing to the Government for increase of the water supply in this city, the District's half of which amounts now to something like $1,200,000. That is stricken out.

In 1882, when the water-works extension was provided for by Congress, the whole amount was authorized to be advanced and paid by the Federal Government, with the provision that one-half should be reimbursed to the Government from the District funds arising from water rates. Two or three years passed without any steps being taken on the part of the commissioners to provide for this reimbursement. In that condition of things in 1884 Congress concluded to fix a time and a manner for the repayment of this advance by the Government, and passed in the District of Columbia appropriation act for 1885 the following provision:

That hereafter it shall be the duty of the commissioners of the District of Columbia to include in their annual estimates for the expenses of the water department an estimate, to be made by the Treasurer of the United States, of the amount necessary to refund, in not less than twenty-five annual installments, one-half of the amount advanced by the United States under the said act of July 15, 1882, with interest on said amount at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, computed annually on the principal sum remaining unpaid.

It will be observed that this provision does not require that this indebtedness shall be paid only in twenty-five yearly installments, but that it shall be done "in not less than twenty-five annual installments," thus making it competent for Congress at any time to alter the terms of the repayment, and this the House has proposed to do.

At the close of the last fiscal year there was a surplus of District revenues in the Treasury amounting to about $385,000. The estimated revenues for 1889 are placed at $2,363,000.

The bill as passed by the House provided for the District for next year on the basis of an increase over the current year's appropriation of nearly a quarter of a million dollars, including an increase for street improvements of $100,000, and for the erection of eight new school-houses. We believe the house gave amply, indeed liberally, for the District Government, and that the sum total of the bill as passed by the Senate is out of proportion to the city's growth, and beyond the necessities of any municipality of like population and importance. As compared with the appropriations for former years it is out of proportion and is without precedent.

We think there is no better or more honest purpose to which the surplus revenues of the District should be applied than the extinguishment of the debt which the District owes the Government, and which we are under no contract or obligation not to require speedy settlement of, because originally there was no provision for its return except in general terms, and since that time Congress has only said it should be done in not less than twenty-five annual installments.

There is nothing in the way of Congress saying now that with this surplus some of it may be and shall be paid sooner. It must be remembered that the people of this District are paying 3 per cent. interest on that debt. Now, we think that this bill as it went from the House was a liberal bill, increasing the appropriation above that of last year to the amount of about a quarter of a million. The bill comes back to us with an increase of something over a million over the current year, which is largely over the increase of any past year. This is a sudden and large increase, and the conferees of the House have not felt authorized to accede to these propositions, and have therefore been compelled to report to the House their disagreement. I submit the following statement, showing in detail the increases proposed by the Senate; also statements of previous appropriations for the District.

Mr. ADAMS. I understand that the conferees believed they could substantially agree except in regard to one item. I did not understand what that item was.

Mr. CLEMENTS. There are several items.

Mr. ADAMS. I will ask the gentleman first in regard to the increase of $750,000 for paving streets.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The increase of $300,000 for street improvements is one of the points upon which we have been totally unable to agree.

Mr. ADAMS. In what part of the city are the streets designed to be improved?

Mr. CLEMENTS. All parts.

Mr. ADAMS. Was it not alleged, and does not the gentleman believe, that there is a very strong popular demand in some parts of the city—I do not refer to the fashionable part, but, say, the northeast, if I remember the points of the compass aright—for the improvement of the streets? Is it not generally believed here that the improvement of those streets would really benefit the tax-payers as a whole by increasing the assessable values?

Mr. CLEMENTS. It is doubtless true that where you pave in front of the houses on a street, the value of those houses is increased. The improvement is undoubtedly beneficial to that property, and of course it is beneficial to a certain extent to all the property of the city, as any general improvement must be. We concede that; but still we think that these improvements should go on reasonably and gradually, increasing according to the increase in population and to the requirements of the city.

Mr. ADAMS. I hope the gentleman has taken into consideration that the increase should be something more than proportional. You can not very easily judge from the appropriations of former years——

Mr. CLEMENTS. That is one way of considering it.

Mr. ADAMS. There should be an increase in the ratio of increase. I have a very strong impression that there is a general demand for the improvement of streets which the people have never been able to get improved. What we want here, I think, is to find out what is alleged on behalf of these improvements, so that the House can decide.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Well, it is alleged in behalf of this appropriation for the improvement of streets that it would enhance the general value of property, particularly in the section where the improvements are made; that it would increase values and increase revenue, and that it is needed. That is the argument of those who press the appropriation. I am frank to say that. But we can not improve all of the streets upon which the value of the property would be increased by such improvements, and I apprehend that that is hardly a fair rule to make appropriations upon—the simple proposition that the improvements would increase the value of property. The House has recognized the propriety of increasing the provision for these street improvements over the appropriations of previous years and gave $100,000 more for this object than was appropriated for the current year. It should not be lost sight of that for every dollar drawn from the citizens of the District for their municipal expenditures the people of the country at large are called upon to pay a dollar, and from this standpoint I do not believe a ratio of increase that doubles former appropriations is justifiable.

Mr. ADAMS. I will ask the gentleman a question in regard to one other item which he has mentioned, to wit, the surplus. The Senate, as I understand, struck out the provision of the House bill. Did they propose any disposition to be made of that surplus?

Mr. CLEMENTS. They did not, except to appropriate it in the way proposed by their amendments.

Mr. ADAMS. And that would partly go to the paving of streets.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Largely so. Three hundred thousand dollars would go that way.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman——

Mr. CLEMENTS. I want to say before the gentleman asks his question that another point of disagreement, and a vital one, was upon the question of the control of the contingent expenses. We think they should be controlled by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury constituted for that purpose, and that they should be audited and supervised as are the expenditures of all other branches of the public service.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not apprehend that there will be any difference of opinion about that.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman what was the estimate for what is called the "permit work?"

Mr. CLEMENTS. The estimate I think was $100,000.

Mr. BAYNE. I have made some inquiry about that subject within a day or two, and I find that the commissioners would now recommend, if they had an opportunity, an appropriation of $144,000, or in round figures perhaps $150,000. I wish to suggest that no appropriation in this bill is more needed than that appropriation for permit work. If there is any measure of improvement called for in the city of Washington, it is to put into better condition these alleys.

Mr. CLEMENTS. That question would not be a material difficulty in the way of agreement by the conference committee.

Mr. ADAMS. Will there be any difficulty in reaching an agreement about the schools?

Mr. CLEMENTS. If we agree on these other things, we can, in my judgment, come together on that matter.

Mr. RANDALL. I confess to a good deal of surprise at the reply of the gentleman from Georgia in answer to an inquiry of mine, in which he states that the commissioners of this District object to having their accounts of expenditures from the contingent fund audited by the First Comptroller. In my long experience I have never known any public officer who, when this matter has been suggested, has raised any objection to the adoption of such a plan of scrutiny. Upon the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, supported by the uniform action of the House, there has been inaugurated a policy under which no contracts causing expenditures of money from the Treasury or involving the credit of the Government are allowed to escape the investigation of the Treasury officers. There is no reason in the world why an officer of the District of Columbia, endowed with authority to involve the Government in expenditure, should not be treated in just the same way as all other officers are treated under the policy I have mentioned, so that his accounts may be properly examined by the accounting officers of the Treasury. On the other hand, there is every reason why this should be done. The reasons are absolutely so plain and imperative that I hope the conferees on the part of the House will never assent to a change of policy in this direction.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], a member of the committee.

Mr. MCCOMAS. This bill as amended by the Senate presents a very marked increase of appropriations upon the bill as passed by the House. If the bill should be enacted in the form passed by the Senate there would be an appropriation on behalf of the District of Columbia in excess of the revenues of the District for the year. The conferees on the part of the House had some hesitation in assenting to so rapid an advance. But on all of the Senate amendments except those relating to three subjects there would in all probability have been easy agreement. In regard to the expenditures for police, for the fire department, for schools and school buildings, I apprehend no serious trouble in reaching an agreement. In reference to the control of the expenditure of the contingent funds allowed here and there in the bill there was a very marked difference of opinion. On the one hand it was contended that a municipality can not, as can a mere bureau, be subjected to the judgment of an auditing officer in the exercise of a discretionary power; that sudden emergencies, unforeseen necessities, in reference to municipal affairs, require a power of expenditure which can not be subjected to such control as can the expenditures in other Departments or bureaus of the Government. On the part of the House, it was urged, on the other hand, that the considerations I have just mentioned were an argument against the existing system of government; that the principle of auditing public expenditures by approved methods in the various Departments of the Government could not be departed from in the District without danger; that we could not properly sanction on the part of these disbursing officers a freedom from control in regard to the expenditure of the public money. This is the first point in dispute.

Upon one other subject there is a considerable difference between the House and the Senate. The present bill as it left the House appropriated for repair and construction of streets, avenues, alleys, roads, and the like, $759,256, a sum which, after inquiry, we find to be double that expended in the city of San Francisco for such purposes; far beyond similar expenditures in Baltimore; and, if we are properly advised, in excess of corresponding expenditures for New York City itself.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the gentleman mean to say that there is properly any analogy between the appropriations for the paving of streets in Washington and corresponding appropriations in an old city like Baltimore? Is there not a great difference in this respect: that Washington has never been improved as it should have been, and that there has been for ten or fifteen years a demand for such improvement; while Baltimore is an old city in which the bulk of these appropriations must be for repairs?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I am simply stating these conflicting views, without undertaking to comment very much upon their merits. But the difference between the age of Baltimore and that of Washington is not so great probably as my friend suspects.

Mr. ADAMS. I was simply suggesting the comment that might be made.

Mr. MCCOMAS. And there are other considerations. The gentleman might have suggested that the streets in other cities are narrow, while they are wide here and require more outlay for paving.

The appropriation for the same purposes last year was $651,000, allowing for this year an excess of $100,000 over the expenditure of last year.

These appropriations for streets are the second point in dispute between the two Houses, for the Senate amendments propose for these purposes—construction, repair, and outlay upon streets, avenues, alleys, roads, and the like—an expenditure of $1,184,000. On the difference between the House bill and the Senate bill, amounting to over $400,000, the conferees of the two Houses have been unable to agree, and have made this report, declining to take the responsibility of assenting to so large an increase without the instruction of the House.

The revenues of the District estimated for the next year are $2,363,271, whereas in the bill as it passed the Senate the sum payable of the total appropriations by the District would be $2,531,873, leaving an excess to be provided for over and above the estimated revenue of $148,602. Now, upon the face of it, I hesitate to agree to expend in excess of the estimated revenues of the District for the coming year the whole amount here proposed. It is fair to say, however, that the surplus revenues of the District accumulated on July 1, 1887, were $381,323. But during this session of Congress we appropriated in the deficiency bill $355,000 for the purpose of finishing the water-works tunnel, which would nearly absorb the whole of the surplus revenue for the past year.

It is also fair to say that the revenues in excess for the coming year will be considerably greater than the excess of the revenues of the last year; but no one has been able to give us an undisputed estimate of that surplus revenue for the current year. But I believe that we ought to use part of this money to pay off a portion of the water-tunnel debt now bearing interest, and out of the balance can appropriate liberally, amply, for the improvement of the streets and avenues and county roads, which have been too long neglected, and which leading out into Maryland will open up the best markets for this city. For this plan of opening up the city to the country I have always contended and do now. We can pay and ought to pay out of the current surplus revenue the $355,000 of the water-works in order to avoid the needless increase of the funded debt of the District, and needlessly pay 3 per cent. interest thereon out of the funds of the District; an available surplus ought first to be used to pay this floating debt. In other words, I do not believe that it is good financiering for the District to extend its avenues and streets to quite the degree proposed by the Senate in the next year, instead of paying this current indebtedness out of the current funds. I prefer out of the surplus to pay as we go, and then build the streets with liberal and fairly apportioned appropriations out of the balance of the funds.

Mr. Speaker, I base my conclusions in regard to this matter on the concern I feel for the development of this great capital city, and because I do not want to see a reaction. I do not compare the city of Washington with the other great cities of the country in one respect, for I believe it ought to be improved and beautified and made worthy of being the capital city of a great nation. It will soon have an immense population. It will soon be the capital of a country having a population of 150,000,000 people. Believing this to be true, and recognizing the rapid growth of the city, commensurate with the rapid growth of the population of our country, I favor the continuance of this system whereby the Government pays dollar for dollar with the people of the District in improving and beautifying the city. I already realize that there is a growing sentiment in Congress in favor of repealing the organic law whereby Congress pays one-half of the expenditures in this District. I am apprehensive that the expenditure annually of twelve hundred thousand dollars on the streets and avenues, alleys and roads here may suddenly lead to a repeal of this system, and I want this system to prevail for many years so that through a series of years Congress may pay half of generous appropriations for this District.

I believe we owe that much not only to the people of the country but to the name of the country, and to the pride and the glory of the nation, to pay dollar for dollar of these expenditures here; but I believe that the giving of large appropriations, like this suggested by the Senate in a lump in this year, and following it up next year by other appropriations of a similar character, will, in the end, tend to the creation of a sentiment in the Congress of the United States which will eventually repeal the present form of dividing these appropriations between the District and the people of the country at large. It is therefore as a true friend of the District, because I am a friend to the growth and development of the city, not spasmodic but continuous, that I want to prevent the adoption of extravagant appropriations in a single year which will tend to create a sentiment which will break up a system which has produced such happy results for the District and the city. Believing that these vast appropriations would tend to endanger that condition of things, I oppose them as a friend of the city. I prefer, therefore, liberal appropriations extending over a series of years.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will this appropriation exhaust the surplus?

Mr. MCCOMAS. It will if all of the amendments of the Senate should be adopted, and if a liberal part of the surplus be appropriated to the payment of three or four hundred thousand dollars of the water-tunnel debt, for which this District now owes more than a million dollars payable at will.

Now, there is a third and last point in dispute, and that is the putting of telegraph, telephone, and electric-light wires under-ground. By the rapid growth of the use of electricity for many purposes throughout the city it will not be long before there will be a perfect network of wires between the heavens and the houses and streets of this city unless we call a halt. I hold in my hand a letter from the very intelligent and very excellent engineer commissioner, Charles W. Raymond, now happily in charge of these affairs under the District government.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman from Maryland permit me to ask him to state the exact condition of this question of putting the wires under the ground?

Mr. McCOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. As I understand it, the House wants to put them under the ground here.

Mr. McCOMAS. Yes; the House wants to do so, and the Senate says it would like to have them put under the ground, but does not think it feasible at present; that it ought to be done at some time in the future.

Mr. KELLEY. It has been found feasible in Philadelphia to put them under-ground.

Mr. ADAMS. They are also under-ground in Chicago.

Mr. RYAN. And other cities have done the same thing. There is no reason why it should not be done here.

Mr. McCOMAS. It is practicable everywhere. It is simply whether we shall require it to be done or not; that is all. There is a way if we have the will.

Mr. KELLEY. It ought to be required in all cases.

Mr. McCOMAS. And if the House insists that it shall be done, I believe it can be done eventually.

Mr. KELLEY. I know it can be done.

Mr. McCOMAS. It will be done.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Why has not the committee provided it shall be done?

Mr. McCOMAS. The committee and the House did put a proviso upon the bill, which was stricken out by the Senate. I had the honor to propose this proviso, and the committee unanimously favored it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What has the conference committee done with it?

Mr. McCOMAS. They have failed to agree upon doing anything. The Senate has insisted upon doing nothing and we insist on doing something.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the conferees on the part of the House will not yield to the Senate.

Mr. McCOMAS. We have not yielded to the Senate upon that question, and after this expression of unanimity in this House we could not yield.

I will now ask the Clerk to read a part of this very interesting letter from Major Raymond.

The Clerk read as follows:

The main public uses to which electricity is at present applied are electric lighting, the telephone service, and the telegraph service. Electric lighting, generally speaking, requires currents of high intensity, and the best authorities still consider it necessary that conductors conveying such currents should be widely separated from those carrying low-tension currents such as are employed in the telegraph and telephone services. The gathering together of conductors employed for these different purposes in the same conduit is believed to involve not only grave complications in the working of the low-tension systems but also serious dangers to the public. I am aware that the collection of high and low tension conductors in one conduit is claimed to have been satisfactorily accomplished in some special cases, but the successful establishment of such a system on any extensive scale is considered too doubtful to warrant its adoption, especially in the city of Washington, where the width of the streets and avenues renders it unnecessary to make so hazardous and uncertain an experiment. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the electric-light wires and those for the telegraph and telephone services should be laid in entirely separate conduits.

There are now about 9.64 miles of wire employed in the city of Washington for the public lighting of the streets. Of these about 5.2 miles are under-ground, the conduits extending along Pennsylvania avenue from First to Fifteenth street northwest, thence on Fifteenth street from Pennsylvania to New York avenues, and thence along Pennsylvania avenue to Washington Circle; on Fourteenth street from Pennsylvania to New York avenue northwest, and on New York avenue from Fourteenth to Fifteenth street northwest.

These wires are entirely separate from those employed for other purposes. Although the experiment has not proved completely satisfactory, the results are believed to warrant its continuance and justify its gradual and careful extension.

The wires employed in the telephone service have already, to a great extent, been placed under-ground. In compliance with the orders of the commissioners, more than 5 miles of conduits have been constructed by the telephone company for this purpose, and 1,356 miles of wire have been buried, constituting more than two-thirds of the trunk-lines employed. The system works well, but recent improvements in the manufacture of cables justify the expectation that better results can be obtained. Since the burying of the remaining overhead wires in this service involves extensive excavations in the streets, it is not considered desirable to undertake this until the result of experiments now in progress has been ascertained, especially as the delay will be short. If these results prove satisfactory, all trunk-lines now overhead should be placed under-ground as soon as possible. There are about 650 miles of such lines.

The company intends to put about 200 miles of this wire under-ground and to bury in addition about 200 miles of new wire. When this work is completed the telephone service will have about 1,756 miles of wire in under-ground trunk-lines and only 450 miles in trunk-lines overhead.

A portion of the wires employed in the District service for fire-alarm, police, and other purposes has been placed under-ground, and the system works in the most satisfactory manner. For this purpose nearly 5 miles of conduits, containing more than 25 miles of wire, have been constructed. To complete the system about 550 miles of wire should be buried, and this ought to be done as rapidly as means permit.

The wires employed in the general telegraph service have not to any considerable extent been placed under-ground in the District of Columbia. There are about 473.14 miles of such wires, only 23.5 of which are buried. The practicability of burying these wires without great injury to the service has been seriously questioned. Upon this point I hesitate to express a decided opinion, since I have not as yet been able to give the subject careful investigation and study, but experience in other cities leads me to believe that this work can be successfully accomplished. For example, it is stated in the report of the board of commissioners of electrical subways of the city of Brooklyn that the Western Union Telegraph Company and the Gold and Stock Telegraph Company have agreed to place their conductors along certain routes in under-ground conduits; and although I am unable to say at the present moment how much progress has actually been made, it appears that the Western Union Company alone buried about 32 miles of wire during the year 1887. In their report for the year 1886 the Brooklyn commissioners remark that "the problem appears to be solved for this city, so far as telephone and telegraph lines are concerned." This commission is one of high ability, and I have great confidence in its opinion.

In addition to the wires included in the above statement there are now in the District about 35 miles of wire employed and controlled by the General Government. Of these about 31.2 miles are under-ground. There are also about 13.68 miles of wire employed for private lighting, of which about .68 miles are under-ground.

The following table shows approximately the character, quality, and location of electric wires in the District of Columbia:

Service.	Miles of conduit.	Miles of under-ground wires.	Miles of overhead wires.
Telegraph	2.1	23.5	473.14
District fire-alarm and police	5.1	21	550
Telephone	4.9	1,356	650
Electric lighting, public	4.6	5.2	4.24
Electric lighting, private	.34	.68	13
Total	17.04	1,406.38	1,690.38

Mr. McCOMAS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have had that letter read so that those who care to hear it may know it is no longer an experiment in other cities of the country, and that in this city of Washington, for which we are now legislating, there are 1,406.38 miles of under-ground wire to 1,690.38 miles of overhead wire.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Who wrote that communication?

Mr. McCOMAS. Maj. Charles W. Raymond, the able engineer commissioner of the District.

It has been stoutly contended in debate elsewhere that it was impossible to put electric-light wires under-ground; that the attempt was a failure, and it could not be done with the present knowledge of the subject. Yet at the moment of that debate, out of all the miles of electric wire in this city, only 4.25 miles were overhead, while 5.2 miles were under-ground already. Yet the proposition seems to have failed elsewhere because gentlemen thought the thing which was done to a greater extent with the electric-light wires than with telephone and telegraph wires in this city could not be done at all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me ask my friend if his attention has been called to the fact that in the city of Philadelphia they have demonstrated the practicability of putting electric wires under ground? There they have miles of electric wire under-ground.

Mr. McCOMAS. Yes; I am glad the gentleman has referred to that matter. In Philadelphia and in Brooklyn, notably, it has succeeded. The contest is whether they shall have the electric-light wires in the same conduit with the wires of the telephone and telegraph service, which conduct currents of lower tension or intensity, while the electric-light wires conduct currents of higher intensity. I believe it has been found better to put them in separate conduits; but they are all put under-ground.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think in Philadelphia they put them in one conduit, but separate them by wooden boxes.

Mr. McCOMAS. They certainly are put under-ground.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, this committee does not insist and the conferees on the part of the House do not insist that their mode of arranging these wires is the only proper mode. They take it that the sense of this House is in favor of putting the wires under-ground, and they have a provision prepared by the eminent counsel of the commissioners, Hon. A. G. Riddle, which they have endeavored and will again strive to substitute for the proviso stricken out by the Senate.

If we succeed in our contention, no single wire of these companies will hereafter be strung over the streets, avenues, or roads of this city; it will stop from this day, and not another wire shall go overhead. All that are run hereafter shall be put under-ground. When the Government's own wires are mostly under-ground, why should not the Western Union Telegraph Company have its wires under-ground? We put our own telephone wires under-ground; why should not the telephone company put its wires under-ground? They are nearly so now. In view of the great advancement in electric lighting we should not wait for the future. In the course of the current year many miles of electric-lighting wires will be put up in this city. They ought to be put under-ground when they are run; and in some proper way all that are now overhead should be put under-ground.

In the interment of these wires the commissioners have no ample power. By act of Congress some years ago all these highways were left open for the telegraph companies to run their wires overhead. One corporation here, after a long contention, actually cut all the telephone wires under the pavement along its line. There is trouble in getting them under-ground in some of the streets because of the vaults under the pavements. As the companies will not go under-ground voluntarily, if we wait longer soon they will darken the air with their clouds of wires—clouds increasing all the while.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it be the duty of any city to control these agencies and to see to the interment of the wires, that ought to be the case in the capital of the country. Resistance should be made to the claims of these corporations to take the sky and air when the wires can be interred in the earth, and will there subserve all the uses of the community. I think if there be one place where we ought to insist as an example to the country that this shall be done it is here in this city. If it is to be done, we must lodge a discretion somewhere. We propose to put it in the hands of the commissioners, with power to inflict penalties in cases where wires are put overhead or where there is too great delay in putting them under-ground.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like to ask my colleague, what are the objections made to placing these wires under-ground?

Mr. McCOMAS. The objections are numerous. The first is the one which has been exploded by the concurrent testimony of so many gentlemen here to-day, the objection that it can not be done. That is the main objection. That, we think, is exploded. The second is that from long usage here, citizens are accorded certain vault privileges under the pavements, and think that the Congress of the United States and the commissioners of the District have no right to take any space more than 6 inches for pavement, and that everything else is to be devoted to private interests and not reserved for public control.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. What do you say as to that?

Mr. McCOMAS. The courts seem to say that that is the law, though an appeal is pending. But I do not believe it is beyond the power of Congress to say that it will take control for the public use of the streets, sidewalks, and alleys to such an extent as to enable these agencies to be put under-ground. There is no constitutional inhibition which prevents us from doing the right thing here in this seat of government.

Congress may do what a State Legislatnre may not do under the constitutional provisions in respect to the impairment of contracts. Congress may do this incidentally, even if it conflicts with existing licenses or permits. I insist with great earnestness and confidence that we have ample powers to control this matter. Now, when we decide to do this it should be done by placing the matter in the discretion of the commissioners as to the kind of conduits, the places where they shall be put, and the time when the change shall be made. Nobody wants to ruthlessly cut off the communications of these companies, as was done by the blizzard some months ago; but we ought to insist that reasonably, as to time and manner, and finally these agencies shall be put under-ground, and that discretion as to the manner and the time shall be lodged in the commissioners.

Mr. GROUT. I suppose another objection is that it would be more expensive.

Mr. McCOMAS. Yes, that is one objection, that it would cost the companies something. But they make us pay very liberal tolls. When I telegraph I pay what they charge, and we all expect to do the same when they have put their wires under-ground. And this great monopoly of Jay Gould will charge us enough to pay the cost.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. It ought to be done in the interest of the public safety.

Mr. McCOMAS. Yes; it is necessary also in the interest of the public safety, as my friend from Ohio suggests. Why, Mr. Speaker, only the other day a distinguished jurist of New York State, Judge Andrews, was thrown from his horse by a wire, and still, I believe, lies dangerously ill. Every now and then a broken wire kills a man, a woman, or a child, and during the late "blizzard" the press was filled with accounts of accidents of that sort. For all these reasons it is high time that this reform be made. The objection is urged, also, that this is a too weighty discretion to lodge in the hands of the commissioners, that they might do some wonderful or dangerous thing.

Sir, my observation leads me to just the contrary conclusion. All the arguments that have been addressed to me in person upon this subject have been by the agents and in behalf of these companies, the telegraph companies, the telephone companies, the electric-light companies, and the safe-deposit company, these corporations which are claiming the streets and the air. When I have been spoken to on the subject from time to time, in the committee or elsewhere, it has been urged upon me that we should not do this thing, that we ought not to go so fast, that we ought to stand still. Nobody has come to me on behalf of the people to urge that the wires should be put under-ground, although I believe that the mass of the people agree, as I now see the House agrees, that that should be done. Therefore, sir, my answer to this objection is that the commissioners will be so beset by these companies and their representatives that there is no danger of their going too fast, but the danger will be that they will go too slow. If it be the sense of the House, I should like to have it say and insist that these wires shall no longer incumber the air, but shall, within a reasonable time, in a reasonable manner, and under reasonable conditions, be put under-ground, and that no other wires shall be put above ground after the adjournment of this Congress. I now ask my colleague [Mr. CLEMENTS] to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. CLEMENTS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall probably not occupy two minutes. I find here six points of difference between the Senate and the House. It is a custom of conference committees, and a bad custom, not to agree upon any point until they can agree on all. The conferees on the diplomatic appropriation bill set us a good example the other day by agreeing whenever they could agree, and reporting the one point upon which they could not yield to the Senate. Now, there being a disagreement here, I believe that this House ought to agree wherever it can reasonably yield to the Senate, and thereby impose upon the Senate the responsibility of holding out on those points as to which the House can not consistently and logically agree. For my part, I shall be glad to vote to concur in the Senate amendment in the matter of paving streets, and also in the Senate appropriation for schools. But I cordially agree with the position of the House conferees on most of the other points involved. I hope, therefore, that I shall have an opportunity, under the rules, to make a motion to concur on the points I have indicated. I think I am entitled to a division of the question so soon as the gentleman from Georgia shall bring the House to a vote upon any disagreement between the Houses.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I call for the previous question on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, when there are several points of disagreement is not the question divisible?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. After the conference report shall have been agreed to, it will be in order to insist on the disagreement to the Senate amendments or to move to recede from the disagreement and concur.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I now move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and ask a further conference.

Mr. ADAMS. I now ask for a division of the question, so that we may have a separate vote on the Senate amendment in regard to paving streets, upon which I wish to move concurrence in the Senate amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not this conference report an entirety?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report has been agreed to. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS] is now that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and ask a further conference. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] is entitled to a division of the question.

Mr. CLEMANTS. This is not a report agreeing to certain amendments and disagreeing to others, but it is a report of total disagreement as an entirety. I therefore submit that after the report has been adopted the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is in order for the House to recede from its disagreement to any of the amendments, and to concur.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have a vote.

Mr. ADAMS. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate in regard to the paving of streets, and concur in that amendment.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. ADAMS. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate in regard to schools and school houses, and concur in the same.

The motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS] that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and ask a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. CLEMENTS, Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL, and Mr. McCOMAS.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the House has decided to dispense with private business to-day; but before we go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union I wish to ask consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 6514, providing for what is known as "4th of July claims." I would like to have the immediate action of the House on this bill. These claims are reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress as having been passed upon and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury. This is a bill of the same character as that which is passed regularly at every session of every Congress. It can not possibly create discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6514) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be now considered in the House. Is there objection?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This being private bill day, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill now, with the understanding that discussion upon it shall not exceed thirty minutes. I am willing to make this concession in favor of private business.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to inquire the nature of these claims.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is the usual bill for the payment of "4th of July claims." A similar bill has been passed by Congress at every session, I believe, since the war, and usually, I think, by unanimous consent. It embraces claims which have been audited by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. These claims are reported by the Secretary of the Treasury as having been regularly allowed. The bill can not possibly require any discussion. I do not know that it is necessary even to read the bill, as it simply enumerates the names of claimants, with the amount allowed to each.

A MEMBER. What is the aggregate?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The aggregate is $108,037.22.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the bill may be passed by unanimous consent without reading, because it will take three-quarters of an hour to read it. It is usually passed without reading.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. As I have stated, the bill contains nothing but a list of claimants, with the amount allowed to each.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And the aggregate amount is less than in any former year.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I give my assurance to the House that, in addition to the names of the claimants and the amounts allowed to each, there is nothing in the bill except one amendment of the act of last session. One claim which was included in the bill of last session was found upon examination to have been sent in by the accounting officers by mistake, the claim having been previously allowed and paid. This bill includes a clause to repeal that provision of the last bill, which provided for the payment of the sum of $280.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask whether there is any general legislation of any character in the bill?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. None whatever.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the bill be passed without reading.

Mr. HOLMAN. No attention has been called to this bill up to the present time, and I presume very few gentlemen have had an opportunity of looking over it and understanding its provisions. I suggest, therefore, that the reading of the bill proceed for the present (I do not know that I shall insist upon its being read through), so that time may be given to look into the bill. I do not think the condition of our business is such as to justify the passage of this bill without some examination. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] suggests to me that the bill be permitted to go over until to-morrow morning, with the understanding that then unanimous consent shall be asked for its consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask by unanimous consent that the bill be put on its passage after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to look at the bill before it is taken up for consideration. I ask the gentleman to postpone the consideration of the bill until to-morrow morning.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I am willing to do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What motion does the gentleman submit?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I ask that the consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, and that the bill be then put on its passage.

Mr. RYAN. Why, this bill is not before the House.

Mr. ROGERS. Put through without reading?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, but that to-morrow morning the consideration of the bill shall be entertained by the House.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be taken up for consideration to-morrow morning, after the reading of the Journal, without being read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I can not consent to that. Let the bill be postponed for consideration until to-morrow morning.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I consent to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What motion does the gentleman submit?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. All I wish to do is to get the bill before the House for consideration. I now move, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be taken up in the House to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HOLMAN. That it is to be considered in the House to-morrow morning.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes; to be considered in the House to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will incorporate in his motion a provision that the debate on the bill shall not exceed thirty minutes.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I am willing to agree to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifteen minutes on each side. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

LOAN OF TENTS TO THE SOCIETY OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask by unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution rendered necessary by a mistake made in the joint resolution authorizing the loan of tents and tent equipage to the veteran organizations of the Society of the Army of the Potomac. The War Department has discovered a defect in the resolution which has already passed the House and has gone to the President for his signature. The only change in the joint resolution which I propose to introduce at this time is in striking out "tent" and inserting "camp;" so it will read "camp equipage," which is the proper technical expression.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill has already been enrolled.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It has gone to the President to be signed. I now ask to introduce another resolution at this time striking out "tent" and inserting "camp," so it will read "camp equipage." It is necessary that this joint resolution should pass to-day to provide for the celebration next Monday.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, by unanimous consent, introduced the following joint resolution (H. Res. 188) authorizing the loan of tents and camp equipage to the veteran organizations of the Society of the Army of the Potomac.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, at the annual reunion of the Society of the Army of the Potomac, held at Saratoga, N. Y., in 1887, a resolution was passed extending to all the survivors of the battle of Gettysburgh an invitation to meet in fraternal reunion on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the battle of Gettysburgh, July 1, 2, and 3, 1888, on the field of Gettysburgh, and as the invitation has been generally extended and accepted: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to loan to the committee in charge of quarters of the Society of the Army of the Potomac such tents and camp equipage as may be needed for the sheltering of the veteran organizations participating in said anniversary, and that to prevent loss or damage resulting from the use of said tents and camp equipage, the Secretary of War is authorized to detail troops to take charge of the same and to provide for the safe keeping and transportation under the direction of the Quartermaster-General.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TARIFF.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The line before the committee is:

Rags, of whatever material composed.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] moved to strike out the words "of whatever material composed."

Mr. ADAMS. The amendment I made was a formal one. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his formal amendment?

Mr. ADAMS. I do.

Mr. KELLEY. I renew the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there is but one kind of rags to be affected by this provision embodied in the bill under the head of "Rags, of whatever material composed." All rags fit for paper, and that includes all the forms of rags of linen and cotton goods, are now on the free-list.

This is, therefore, a provision to admit woolen and worsted rags in free competition with the wool-growers of the United States. It is nothing more nor less than the following up of the action of yesterday in inviting the importation of cheap adulterants for the coffee of the laboring people and the poorer classes of this country.

Carlyle must have foreseen that such a body as the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means would arrive at prominence some day when he dubbed the system of political economy as the "dismal science" and designated it as "the road to the cheap and nasty." Our friends are devoting themselves with all their energy and zeal over there to make a system of manufactures in this country which will substitute forever the cheapest and the nastiest competing articles that the world can produce.

I have in my hand a little book entitled "The History of the Shoddy Trade, its Rise, Progress, and Present Position." It was written by Rev. Samuel Jubb, a clergyman of the Church of England, and published in 1860 by Houlston & Wright, of London; John Heywood, of Manchester, and J. Fearnsides, of Batley, England.

Gentlemen on the other side continually harp on the heavy duties imposed by the Republican side on cheap blankets. They say, "Here you are willing to give to the people of the country free whisky"—of course there is no truth in the statement, but still they say it—"and impose the heaviest duties upon the poor man's blankets and clothing."

Now I want to show you something of the character of this branch of manufacture as it appears from this little book. I read from page 52, under the head of "Colored blankets:"

COLORED BLANKETS.

These have been made largely for some years for the American market—gentian, gray, blue-gray, and green are the prevailing descriptions. The widths and qualities vary materially, and consequently the values. The lowest kind is a very inferior gray fabric, at a correspondingly low price. The writer understands that the bulk of these blankets is consumed in the slave States of America, and that the low gray blankets just adverted to are designed chiefly for the use of the slaves, both as coverlets and materials for garments. Dewsbury and Earlsheaton are the centers of this manufacture.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I confess to having been guilty throughout my entire legislative career of attempting to get such duties imposed upon these dog blankets, which were made for the poor whites of the South, and a poorer condition of them for the slaves, so as to shut them out of our markets forever.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. I propose, sir, now to notice a remark that was made after I had left the House on yesterday, thoroughly worn out, by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], which shows several things, and among the rest the value, in some slight degree, of a little knowledge of the history and growth of our industries by a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. I am sorry to say that this paragraph, standing alone, illustrates the utter absence of such knowledge on the part of the gentleman who used it. He says that on July 28, 1866, I used the following language:

Mr. KELLEY. Let the raw material come in. Let us make blankets that will drive out English blankets. Let us make our own "English frieze" and "Peterboro' frosted beaver." Let us be able to rival England and France and other representative nations in making these cloths.

Now the gentleman is not aware probably that at the time that remark was made there was no harmony between our wool growers and our wool manufacturers; that in fact we had no real woolen industry. It was created afterward. We had some woolen mills which had been created by war, as I shall endeavor to show you if time permits; but the treaty between the wool growers and the wool manufacturers, effected largely through the agency of the late John L. Hayes, was what really called into existence our flocks.

The war created manufactories. When the first troops came to Washington at the call of the President for three-months' men, most of those, indeed all from my State, were clad in shoddy clothes. They left home with blouses, or short jackets, and pants, and by the time they got here and marched along the avenue those with short jackets looked as though they had long-tailed coats cut square across, and their pantaloons had no seats in them. They were clad in shoddy, and the ride to the capital to go into the encampment left them in rags; and then we neither had flocks on the hillsides to yield the wool nor the factories on our water courses in which to spin and weave cloth in sufficient quantities to supply the troops. Four years of duty on wool encouraged the growth of sheep. Four years of war developed the art of dyeing, spinning, carding, and weaving; and at its close the clothing of our soldiers bore as marked a contrast to the rags worn by the first regiments as has ever been exhibited in the growth of any industry on earth.

When Johnny came marching home 80,000 strong behind Grant and Sherman he was clad in American cloth. Much of it was American wool. All of it had been spun and woven in our newly-created factories. It is true that in 1866, in order to stimulate the combination and in order to build up factories which would shield our soldiers and our working people from this rotten shoddy, I said, "Yes, import the raw material." But I would not now propose to obliterate the flocks of the country. I would not destroy the great product of American wool. I would not now silence the looms and the spindles of this great nation whose progress in the production of textiles enabled them during the last quarter of a century to exceed any nation or combination of nations in the world.

I shall take advantage of the privilege of enlarging my speech by inserting some extracts from the history of shoddy, so that gentlemen may see what the rags are which we protect by one or two hundred per cent.

The extracts are as follows:

The sources from which soft rags are derived are substantially the same as those from which mungo rags are received. London is the great entrepôt for soft rags; but it must be noted that America, while contributing freely mungo rags, sends us little if any of the soft kind. It is presumable that the whole civilized world is engaged, either directly or indirectly, in supplying this country with linen and woolen rags, or the produce of the latter; if not now, such will, no doubt, be the case shortly, for the field of operation in this respect is apparently ever enlarging. London serves the market with mixed softs, stockings, white flannels, stuffs, carpets, etc., in addition to the large quantities of army cuttings produced there, namely, serge, flannel, and cloth clippings of various colors and qualities; these constitute a valuable part of the rag collection, being new, sound, and of good color and quality. Scotland sends her stockings and mixed rags; Ireland, her white; Germany, her knitted stockings, in gray and white, and also what are termed "nons;" Austria and Italy swell the general stock by their quotas of soft and mungo rags; Turkey and Russia also furnish low coarse softs.

Machines now engaged in grinding soft rags produce four or five packs of shoddy, and those engaged upon hard or cloth rags two to two and a half packs of mungo per day. The machine when operating upon soft rags, particularly the lower descriptions, makes its presence felt by "kicking up a dust" which is by no means pleasant to those who are obliged to keep company with it. The occupation is not to be termed an unhealthy one, though in the case of some few persons it would appear to have induced asthma, and the very nature of the employment suggests this to be the ailment most likely to arise from it. To the uninitiated it must be surprising to see the rags suddenly transformed into fibrous wool, and it is in this process of grinding that the apparent impossibility of making old rags into new cloth vanishes away; for those persons who are otherwise unable to form an idea how the rag is to be metamorphosed into cloth can, when it is assimilated to wool in its form and condition, at once see the solution of the supposed difficulty.

We proceed to furnish some calculations made in 1858 respecting the quantity of rag-wool then being produced, together with the weight of rags required for the same. According to these it is computed that at that time there were fifty rag machines in the township, producing yearly about 13,000,000 pounds weight of shoddy and mungo, the latter estimated at one-third of the whole; this may be so as regards this locality, but taking an average of all the rag-machines at work in the district, which includes Ossett, the proportion of mungo produced is probably from one-third to one-half the aggregate quantity. The following figures present the details of the calculation:

Machines	50
Packs of rag-wool, daily average of production	4
Packs	200
Days per week	6
	1,200
Weeks, per year, allowing two weeks for holidays and repairs	50
	60,000
Reduce into pounds	240
	14,400,000
Deduct 10 per cent. for slack times	1,440,000
Net produce of rag-wool	12,960,000
Add 25 per cent. for waste of rags in grinding and picking	4,320,000
Pounds	17,280,000

Or 7,764 tons of rags.

Assuming the foregoing table to be correct, it shows the large quantity of 7,764 tons of rags converted annually in this township into rag-wool, the produce being 12,960,000 pounds, or 5,785 tons. In the calculations referred to, it was assumed that within a radius of 4 miles of Batley the quantity of rag-wool produced is equal to that at Batley itself, and furthermore, that all the scattered places in the woolen districts, lying beyond the radius in question, produce equally with Batley, or one-third of the total quantity manufactured in the country. According to this assumption there is the enormous weight of 51,840,000 pounds, or 23,143 tons of rags worked up yearly in the shoddy center and districts of the kingdom, yielding 38,880,000 pounds, or 17,357 tons of rag-wool. Calculating the value of this material, shoddy, at an average of 4*d.* and mungo likewise at 6*d.* per pound, and reckoning the latter staple to constitute a third part of the whole, we find the entire quantity to amount to upwards of three-quarters of a million of money. The items of the account stand thus:

25,920,000 pounds of shoddy at 4*d.* per pound	£432,000
12,960,000 pounds of mungo at 6*d.* per pound	324,000
Total	756,000

The following statement presents a tabular view of an approximate calculation relative to the operatives engaged in the shoddy manufacture and the shoddy trade, in the township of Batley, specifying the number of persons employed in the several branches of labor, together with the weekly earnings of each class. It also, on the same principle, but with a nearer approach to certainty, gives the number of "billies," "tommies," and "horses," with their aggregate of spindles at work. Also, the total of mule-spindles, and the amount of nominal horse-power employed; and, moreover, records, as ascertained facts, the number of mills and steam-engines in connection with the business. These particulars are the result of a computation made for another object, in 1858, and, though some changes have occurred since, especially in relation to the increase of power-loom weavers, they may be taken, for all practical purposes, as applicable to the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the formal amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not at this time desire to make any other reply to the gentleman than simply to print in the RECORD a petition from workingmen in Philadelphia.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

When the forty thousand textile workers of Philadelphia, in April, 1886, made the appeal to you, through the Committee on Ways and Means, for relief from the outrageous inequalities, discriminations, and oppressions of the present tariff laws, it was hoped by them that their demands, reasonable as they were, would be heeded, and that partisan, sectional, or class considerations would not be allowed to stand in the way of the doing of a simple act of justice and the righting of the most glaring wrongs. It was the first time that the workingmen spoke on the subject uninfluenced by any outside pressure or coercion, but the answer has been the failure to perfect a measure of relief.

Hence it becomes necessary to renew the appeal, and in doing so we beg leave to submit the reasons and causes that inspire us to this act.

The condition of the textile industries, especially the woolen trade, has been growing worse, the working time in the mills is being shortened, and the wages are being pared down just in proportion as the strain upon the physical exertions of the toiler increases, and we are forced to compete with labor in other parts of our own country that is paid no more than is the much-talked-of "pauper labor" of Europe, and as all this has taken place under a system that is declared to be for the "protection of American labor," are we not justified in making inquiries, with the aid of our experience, as to whether it is so or not?

If there is any virtue in the theory that in order to protect American labor against ruinous foreign competition it is necessary to place a tax upon goods that are brought in from countries where labor is cheaper, it follows that these taxes should in all cases correspond with the amount and cost of labor required upon such goods in their successive stages of manufacture, but this obviously plain and honest rule has never been observed in any tariff law which its framers claimed to be for the protection of labor. That the reverse has been the case naturally excites the suspicion that the design was to crush rather than help labor. In the woolen industry, as in many others, the tax on the raw materials neutralizes the tax on the finished fabrics, and taking quality into account, the tax always graduates downward against quality instead of upwards with it, and in every case exceeds by three to four times the entire labor cost in the product. To call such laws "protective to labor" is a fraud and deception, and labor has a right to protest against the perpetrators of these wrongs being allowed to any longer influence legislation on this subject.

According to Bowes & Co., an accepted authority, 100 pounds of greasy wool will make 21.45 pounds of finished cloth, and on this basis it will require 530 pounds of greasy wool to make 100 yards of cloth with backing, weighing 18 ounces to the yard. Suppose this cloth is made of four different kinds of wool, the cost to the English manufacturer would be—

150 pounds of fourth quality, at 12 cents	$18.00
130 pounds of third quality, at 24 cents	31.20
125 pounds of second quality, at 26 cents	32.50
125 pounds of first quality, at 33 cents	41.25
Total cost of wool	122.95

With precisely the same grades of wool the cost to the American manufacturer would be—

150 pounds of fourth quality, at 23.94 cents	$35.91
130 pounds of third quality, at 37.54 cents	48.80
125 pounds of second quality, at 39.64 cents	49.55
125 pounds of first quality, at 49.61 cents	62.01
Total cost of wool	196.27
Excess of cost to the American manufacturer	73.32

The total cost for labor in making this cloth is not over 27 cents per yard, or $27 for the whole, showing that the tariff-enhanced cost of the material is nearly three times the entire expense for labor.

The importations of woolen and worsted yarns for the years 1886-'87 were 7,039,448 pounds, valued at $4,030,738, on which duties were paid amounting to $2,777,582. The amount of wool required to make this yarn is 28,157,792 pounds. The duty on the wool would be $2,815,779, and adding the charges for carrying the duty we have a total tax burden on the wool of $3,097,356, or $319,776 in excess of the duty on the yarn. The total cost for labor in making this yarn is not over $700,000, showing that the tax on the wool is nearly four and a half times the total labor cost in the yarn. This, on the theory advanced by the modern protection school, can be called by no other name than protection to foreign manufacturers and labor.

The per cent. of duty on the yarn is 69.11, and on the cloth 70.40, a difference of but 1.29 per cent.; but as there is a loss by waste and shrinkage in weaving, dyeing, and finishing of 3 to 5 per cent., we find that this difference between the yarn duty and that on the cloth is more than neutralized, and thus the "protective" duty is again in favor of the foreign cloth manufacturers, who could not have done better for themselves if they had been permitted to make our tariff laws for us.

Under the present law the percentage of duty on the finer and more costly fabrics is always lower than on the coarser and cheaper grades, thus depriving us of the chance to work upon the better class of goods, upon which our work would be lightest and our earnings largest.

The importation of woolen and worsted cloths for the year ended June 30, 1887, was, of the value not exceeding 80 cents per pound, 1,117,564 pounds, valued at $713,315, on which duties were paid amounting to $640,808. Per cent. of duty, 89.84. Value above 80 cents per pound, 7,689,699 pounds, valued at $9,309,054, on which duties were paid to the amount of $6,415,016. Per cent. of duty, 68.91.

This shows how we are crippled, both in our earning powers and in the exercise of our skill by the infamous discriminations of the tariff, which at the same time make the burdens upon the rich comparatively lighter than upon the poor.

It is no stretch of the truth to say that these discriminations against the manufacturing industries have very materially discouraged the use of wool and promoted the substitution of adulterants, most manufacturers having for some time given more attention to the manipulation of substitutes, so as to give them the appearance and touch of wool, than to the matter of improvements in the making of pure woolens in order to compete in quality with their foreign rivals. This has given rise to the impression that we are less skilled than the European workmen, yet it is self-evident that it requires as much if not more skill to work up the adulterants so as to give them a marketable appearance as to manipulate the genuine materials.

A great deal of stuff is put upon the markets now as cassimeres, etc., that does not contain over 10 per cent. of wool. Manufacturers who attempt to make nothing but pure woolens are compelled to close their mills. To make stuffs that shall compete in the markets with foreign makes in texture and variety it is almost invariably necessary to use some wools of foreign growth for mixing with the domestic; but as the tariff enhances the cost of these wools by from 25 to 150 per cent. there is no possibility of the American manufacturer using them in competition, and hence we are forced to give over to the foreign manufacturers the monopoly of all the markets and allow them to supply our own people with goods into which not a pound of American wool enters. Thus the woolen manufactures imported in 1887 amounted to 49,000,000 pounds, which, at 4 pounds of raw wool to the pound of finished product, represented 196,000,000 pounds of wool, which, with the 115,000,000 pounds of raw wool, makes a total importation of 311,000,000 pounds, or considerably more than the entire wool-clip of the United States. If all this had come in free in the raw state it would have absorbed for mixture a large quantity of domestic wool, instead of every pound that did come in anyhow displacing a pound of American wool and at the same time depriving American labor of employment and our poor people of the comfort of woolen clothing.

From a statement recently made public by a leading carpet manufacturer we gleam the fact that ingrain carpets which formerly were made largely of wool are now made of an average of one-fifth wool and four-fifths adulterants, and in the whole of the carpet industry probably not a million pounds of domestic wool is now used. There is no carpet wool raised in this country, and yet a tax of over 26 per cent., which far exceeds all the wages paid in the manufacture of carpets, is still imposed upon the wool which is necessarily brought in from the outside. If this wool were admitted free, a greater quantity would be used, and probably not less than 10,000,000 pounds of domestic wool would be absorbed for mixture.

For these reasons we fail to see how the wool-growers are benefited by the tariff on wool, as it inevitably restricts the market for their wool both by forcing the use of substitutes and by promoting the importation of wool in the manufactured state, all of which must redound to the injury of both the wool-grower and the woolen-worker.

If protection protects, or if the present tariff arrangement is really beneficial to the manufacturing industries, why do the manufacturers find it necessary to form "combines," "arrangements," or "understandings" in order to protect themselves against what they term a demoralized market? Why should they adopt the suicidal policy of reducing the wages of labor, which can not but curtail the absorption of their wares and thus injure their business? Why do workingmen find it necessary to organize for self-protection against the very men who are loudest in their demands for more tariff upon the plea that labor "must be protected?" Men who are really protected need not go to the trouble and expenses of protecting themselves. As "charity begins at home," would it not be more consistent for the protected and protectionist employers to show by the bettering of wages of their employés and by treating them as men—freemen if you please—that their cry for more taxes is not raised solely for their own benefit, and that they are ready to make true the oft-repeated declaration that protection to the manufacturer will enable him to pay high wages?

Now, as he has just the protection he wants, and is still cutting down wages, is it not evident that he is either wrong in his protection theory or is playing "heads I win and tails you lose" with his workingmen? Surely no sane man can see in the "trusts" and "arrangements" of the capitalists and the frantic efforts of labor to hold its own against the encroachments of combined capitalists aught else but the positive and practical proof that protection of labor by a tariff, or by any other tax upon its products, is worse than a failure, because it neutralizes the natural advantages of our country and disarranges the natural course of trade, and thus must result in the destruction of labor. When the manufacturer closes his mill, or lays off any of his hands, he will invariably give as an excuse the bad state of trade, an honest acknowledgment that it is trade that keeps the mill going, and hence is a good thing to keep labor steadily employed and give it a chance for better wages. Now, it is always the part of wisdom to protect ourselves against a bad thing, but it has fallen to the lot of the protectionists to discover the utility of protecting ourselves against a good thing, and in order to accomplish this to tax ourselves to spite and impoverish some one else.

That the protectionist manufacturers do not altogether believe in this theory is evidenced by the fact that they have here an association which has for its object, among others, the securement of a higher tariff for the protection of American labor and, by unity of action, to be better prepared to resist the demands of labor for more wages. But if they really do believe that people can become rich by taxing themselves why do they not try the experiment by taxing themselves to pay us more wages, or why do they resist all our efforts in that direction? It would surely be as cheap, or cheaper, to tax themselves to pay us a little more than it is to tax themselves to pay to the raw-material men much more than our entire wages amount to. Is not this evidence that they are in favor of those taxes of which the largest share flows back into their pockets and falls with crushing weight upon us. Hence we have just cause to demand such a change of the laws as will secure a more equitable distribution of the benefits amongst all the people.

But there is danger in this theory of protection in this, that it involves the delegation or transference of the taxing power to individuals and corporations, thus placing the greatest and widest of all governmental powers and responsibilities into the hands of irresponsible men, whose greed will thus be stimulated to such a degree that soon classes will be created which will be specially interested, and will be powerful enough to override the will of the people and make ours a government of, by, and for the classes. As we as a nation are already tending towards customs and conditions indigenous to European monarchial institutions, are we not justified in sounding the alarm now? And as these tendencies are due solely to the drift of legislation towards restrictions upon the natural powers and privileges of the people, is it not time to turn about and see if by going in the direction of more freedom we will not the more quickly realize the anticipations of the founders of the Republic of making this the most free, and therefore the most prosperous, country on earth, thus setting an example to the world that will cause all other nations to imitate us?

Can it be said that the burdens of taxation are not excessive when they are equal to two dollars for every one dollar of wealth accumulated by the whole people; when they absorb nearly, if not quite, one-half of the earnings of labor, falling ten to twenty times heavier upon those who labor for a living than upon those whose income is from capital, and when they are accumulating in the national Treasury by a hundred million dollars or more, taken from the channels of trade and locked up to be a source of temptation for every political trimmer, jobber, and subsidy shark in the country? When we reflect that this sum, if left among the people to fulfill its legitimate functions in trade, would naturally foster the distribution and absorption of the products of labor to more than ten times the amount of the surplus, we can readily appreciate the full measure of the damage done to labor by the accumulation and locking up of a surplus.

Ignoring the influence of material conditions upon the wages of labor, they have told us that the laying on of these taxes was necessary to keep up the high standard of American wages. If this was correct it would follow that the proportion of wages to materials should have increased during the period of protection. But what are the facts?

In 1850 the proportion of value of materials to the wages of labor in the manufactures was 70 to material, 30 to labor; in 1860, 74¾ to material, 25¼ to labor; in 1870, 76½ to material, 23½ to labor; in 1880, 78 to material, 22 to labor, and now it is about 80 to material, 20 to labor.

Accepting the theory of the modern protection school these figures would furnish the indubitable proof that the tariff has had the effect of raising the cost of the materials and depressing the wages of labor; and when we take in connection with this the wonderful advance in the efficiency of labor during the same period, this table stands as a most terrible indictment against those whose bungling legislation has wrought the mischief.

The relative productivity and earnings of the woolen and worsted weavers in the United States and England will show, too, whether the high standard of wages has been kept up here; and to make the comparison perfectly fair, we will presume that both weave the same class of goods, 80 picks to the inch:

Speed of loom, United States, average, 85 picks per minute.
Speed of loom, England, maximum, 60 picks per minute.
Hours of labor, United States, 60 per week.
Hours of labor, England, 54 per week.
Product per weaver per week of continuous work, United States, 106 yards.
Product per weaver per week of continuous work, England, 68 yards.

The average loss of time caused by breakages, etc., being about one-fifth the net product per week, would be, in the—

United States, 85 yards.
England, 54 yards.

The highest average rate of wages paid in this country for this class of work is 2 mills per pick per yard, or 16 cents per yard for 80-pick work, and if the same rate was paid in England it would follow that the American weaver can earn a possible wage of $13.60 per week to the English weaver's possible $8.64. Of course the actual earnings are less in both cases, but the relative difference will not vary either on a rise or fall. The earnings, however, vary so much throughout our own country as to bring the time earnings of our weavers in some cases even lower than the time earnings of some of the European weavers, as will be seen from the following table, compiled from the first annual report of the National Commissioner of Labor, and the same rule holds good for every other class of workmen in the woolen industry.

Daily wages of woolen weavers in the United States:

Delaware	$1.71	New Jersey	$1.00
Illinois	1.52	New York	1.08
Indiana	1.08	North Carolina	.75
Massachusetts	1.28	Vermont	1.17
Pennsylvania	1.85	Connecticut	1.16

According to the United States consular reports the earnings of woolen weavers in England vary from $3.50 to $11 per week. If we keep in view the relative productivity of the labor of this country and England, we can not avoid the conclusion that the $4.50 per week in North Carolina is below the lowest of England, and does it not prove that the American manufacturer gets his work done cheaper than the English manufacturer, and that therefore the wages of labor do not and can not find consideration in his cry for more protection? It also proves that we are brought into deadly competition with labor in our own country that may be as justly called "pauper labor" as that of Europe. It further proves that the tariff has not even preserved to us our just share of the natural opportunities of the country; that it has only been instrumental in building up colossal fortunes for the few, and that a continuance of it will end in our degradation to a condition of serfdom.

There are a number of mills in and around Philadelphia where $5 a week are considered very good wages now for a weaver, and there are any number of mills in England where these would be considered starvation wages, and whenever the employers here offer a reduction of wages they set up the plea that some of their neighbors are paying less, and hence a reduction is necessary in order to enable them to compete. They seem no longer to fear foreign competition, but it is home competition that is now the great "scare-crow," and we have to suffer from it all. Is it not self-evident that a uniform rate of wages should have resulted from the "protective" tariff if it had the virtues claimed for it by its advocates?

Heretofore labor has had no direct or independent voice in the arrangement of tariff laws, these matters having been entirely left to the bosses and monopolists, who were naturally prompted by selfish and conflicting motives, which is best evidenced by the fact that they have found it profitable to spend vast sums of money, and much time, in maintaining expensive lobbies at Washington and costly organizations all over the country, some of which have as one of their objects and purposes the keeping of the workingmen from getting any share of the "protection" by an advance of wages.

They have subsidized newspapers and maintained literary bureaus in order to influence public opinion and defame the few men who dare to voice our cause. These sums are largely made up of money that should consistently have gone towards the betterment of our wages, and we are thus placed in a condition which deprives us of the ways and means to be heard before Congress upon an equal footing with those who for the protection of labor spend the parings of our wages. Even now, finding that the desire to hear from the workingmen is growing, they are organizing some of their employés into clubs and associations under the direction of the bosses, the expenses being met by outsiders, in order to prepare them for an expression of sentiment and the making of demands that are to be paraded before the world as those of the free and untrammeled workingmen. The cause which requires such work to bolster it up can not be less than an unholy one. The very means condemn the end. Protection means the enslavement of labor, and nothing proves this more emphatically than the fact that there are workingmen, whether, forgetful of the natural dignity of labor, they do it voluntarily, or whether, driven by the force of circumstances brought up by protection, they are compelled to submit to the command to rivet the chains still more tightly about themselves.

But why should we find it necessary to make costly efforts in our behalf in this matter? Are we not represented by those to whom we gave our votes, and to whom we have a right to look for efforts in our behalf and for justice? If we were to spend money or keep up a lobby would it not simply be an acknowledgment that we recognize the power of money to be superior to the will of the people? Shall we be asked to subscribe to the infamous and un-American idea that a well-filled purse gives one man greater rights, powers, and privileges than poverty connected with toil does to the other? To do this would be to confess our loss of faith in a representative free government and our belief that the old-time spirit of fair play and equality has entirely departed from the councils of the nation.

The fact is, there is no government on the face of the globe, however despotic, that is so unmindful of the interests of labor as to tax the raw materials of industry, which tax must inevitably come out of labor in that it neutralizes its opportunities by depriving it of the means to compete with the labor of other countries, notwithstanding its superior productivity, thus forcing down its wages and speeding its enslavement. But it does more. It builds up colossal fortunes for the few at the expense of our toil and its natural rewards, and is already bearing its legitimate fruit in the aping of European aristocracy on the one hand, and on the other compelling the mass to make piteous appeals for leave to toil; ay, forcing them even to beg of some men the permission to obey the command of the Creator "to eat bread in the sweat of their brow." Shall we stand by with folded arms and bated breath whilst we see this "land of the free and home of the brave" transformed to a "land of the master and home of the slave" by a process which even the most despotic government dares not attempt?

Hence we demand the repeal of all taxes upon the raw materials of industry, so that we may be no longer handicapped by costs other than those of production, and that we may be relieved from those depressions of wages which arise from enhanced cost of the necessaries of life, which is due to taxation independent of the cost of production.

In fixing the duties upon manufactured articles care should be taken to measure the duties by the difference there may be in wages between this country and Europe, not forgetting to take into account the relative productivity of labor compared with its earnings, and in all cases the duties should be so graded as to correspond with the amount and quality of labor bestowed upon the article in the various stages of manufacture. That this has never been done in any tariff law called protective has been shown above, and it clearly demonstrates the falsity of the claim of their framers that they considered the interests of labor at all in this work.

Under the present law the duty on cloth weighing 16 ounces to the yard and valued at 80 cents per yard is 63 cents, while the duty and charges on the amount of wool required to make this cloth will be 53 cents, leaving for protection but 10 cents per yard. Under the most radical tariff-reform measure ever offered in Congress the case would be thus:

	Per yard.
Duty on the cloth, 35 per cent	$0.28
Duty and charges on the wool	Nothing.
Clear protection	.28

There is not a woolen or worsted worker in the country who is so blind as not to see that, even on the theory of protection, the tariff reformer who is willing to give him 28 cents against the foreign cloth is a better friend than the protectionist who gives him but 10 cents. Under the present law the duty on a piece of cloth worth 45 cents per yard is 140 per cent., whilst the duty on a piece worth $3.50 per yard is just 50 per cent. How unselfishly careful the protectionists are to make the workingman rich by taxing his cloth 90 per cent. more than the rich man's and at the same time depriving him of the pleasure and profit of making the finer grades of cloth.

We learn from the census of 1880 that the total wage account in the woolen industry was 17.70 per cent. of the value of the product, and we have reason to believe that the percentage is even smaller now and gradually sinking. Now, suppose with wool free the duty was fixed at 18 per cent. of the value of the imported article, varying, of course, with those features which indicate the degree of labor expended, would it not fully and absolutely protect labor, even though the foreign workmen would work for nothing and find themselves? When, therefore, a duty of more than twice that amount is proposed it can surely not be objected to by the woolen-worker on the ground of offering too little protection, because it will give him 32 cents per yard on the same cloth on which the present law gives him but 10 cents.

An excess of duties over differences in the wages of labor can have no other effect than to nullify the efforts of labor, organized or unorganized, to better its condition by placing it absolutely at the mercy of the employer, who, by having his market secured to him by law, can, under the tariff duties, free from the fear of competition, exact from the consumers, who are in large part the workingmen themselves, much more than the wages of labor amount to, while labor, exposed on every side to open competition, is thus forced to pay tribute to the employers, and through them to the controllers of the raw materials, both by suffering a reduction of its time wages and by increased cost of the necessaries of life. This is the shifting of the taxing power which gives the employers privileges that are incompatible with our form of Government, and must thus end in the destruction of our liberties. It encourages, and sometimes forces, the formation of "trusts," "arrangements," and "understandings," drawn together under the fostering influence of "protection" in order to be the better able to bleed the people and build up gigantic fortunes for the beneficiaries of the law.

It has been fashionable to "take all the traffic will bear," and now it is "take all the law will allow," and laws framed under the dictation of the favored monopolists themselves are always sure to give them a wide enough margin to take the "last pound of flesh." Thus, while the wage account in the product is but 17.70 per cent. the bosses are protected by a tax of 70.40 per cent., an advantage of 52.70 per cent., which is the field within which they have free play, by "trusts" and "understandings," to exact special profits and make us pay back to them with double compound interest all that may be given us as an advance of wages.
